CREST REVISITED

Researchers from the I.U. School of Dentistry were in New York City March 12 for a news conference announcing the results of clinical studies on a new toothpaste which they said represents the most significant advance any toothpaste has made in cavity protection since the first fluoride toothpaste was introduced in 1955.

The results, which were confirmed by an independent group from the Ohio State University College of Dentistry, show the new toothpaste -- Advanced Formula Crest -- can substantially improve the cavity protection provided by the current Crest product, the leading selling fluoride toothpaste on the market.

The American Dental Association has given the new Advanced Formula Crest its seal of acceptance. Crest was the first dentifrice to receive ADA acceptance.

"We believe this new dentifrice formula offers a very significant advance, perhaps the most important in the prevention of tooth decay since the first effective fluoride toothpaste -- Crest -- was introduced 25 years ago," said Dr. Maynard K. Hine, former dean of the I.U. School of Dentistry, chancellor emeritus of IUPUI, former president of the ADA, and now a special consultant to I.U. President John W. Ryan.

Dr. Hine noted that I.U. dental researchers played a key role in the development of the original Crest. (Drs. Joseph Muhler, William Nebergall and Harry Day from the dental school were pioneers in the development of that product.)

Dr. Bradley B. Beiswanger, associate professor of preventive dentistry at I.U. and supervisor of the I.U. clinical studies, said, "People will get fewer new cavities with this advanced formula product than with current Crest, and for those of us interested in preventive dentistry, 'fewer cavities' is the name of the game."

Working with Dr. Beiswanger were Dr. Mark E. Mallatt, assistant professor of preventive dentistry at I.U., and Dr. Charles W. Gish from the Indiana State Board of Health.
