PARKING HALTS RETURN TO SCHOOL

By Erma Bombeck

As a woman who has been trying for three years to get through "The Man In The Gray Flannel Suit," I have nothing but admiration for the housewife-mother who returns to the college scene.

At a luncheon the other day I found myself seated near no less than three women who were enrolled in the local university.

One said to the other, "How is it going?"

She shrugged, "Better. I'm getting there earlier now which gives me an advantage."

"How many hours this semester?:"

"Thirty-six a week."

I could contain myself no longer. "You women are unbelievable," I said. "You tend children, run a house and still find time to go to school 36 hours a week. When will you finish?"

"Finish?" said the woman swirling around, "I haven't even started. I've been circling around the university 36 hours a week for the last two years looking for a parking place."

The other two agreed.

It seems the problem is a universal one. It isn't the high cost of tuition and books that makes college prohibitive, it's the cost of parking tickets. It isn't the challenge of older women in a young academic world, it's whether or not you can parallel park a square car on a curved curb.

The way they explained it to me is that a university will build a school to accommodate 25,000 students. There will be 200 parking places. Eighty of them will be for a faculty of 560. Fifty will be allotted to visiting dignitaries who aren't and who never. Forty spaces will be sealed off by ropes and designated with a sign that reads "G-11 Permits" (No one has ever heard of a G-11 Permit, but most suspect this was a freshman initiation prank in 1941.) Thirty parking places are marked "Student" (with two away zone in small letters beneath it).

"Have you approached the university about parking spaces," I asked.

"Yes, they're on order from a company in Wisconsin that is on strike," answered one of the women mechanically. "By the way, what are you reading? 'The Man In The Gray Flannel Suit.'"

"That's the trouble with going to college," said her friend, "You're so busy driving, you never get time to read the new books." (Reprinted from The Indianapolis News, October 16, 1971)
