OF JOBS, CONFERENCES, WOMEN AND YOUTH

May Saturday Review of Education features a three-page interview with Peg Gordon of the Carnegie Commission on Higher Education Staff on the job report. Among her observations to questions: "There's been a clear turnaround in the demand for engineers, for people in business administration... There's not been that much evidence of turnaround in liberal arts." And on credentialism: "We can't ignore it, and I think it is going to become increasingly controversial for several reasons. There will be the natural tendency of employers in a looser labor market for college graduates to give preference to those with B.A.s and more advanced degrees." . . . In Chicago, the American Association for Higher Education relied on solid and offbeat programming to hold its audience at the 28th National Conference on Higher Education. "Quality of Life" was the theme and speakers included Maharishi Mahesh Yogi, a leading proponent of transcendental meditation and composer-poet-mime Michael Colgrass. Dartmouth's Dennis Meadows' keynote address discussed growth and higher education. He warned that academic researchers must "develop a theory of slowing down." All of us have come up through a discipline profoundly influenced by the concepts that growth is possible, probably inevitable, and certainly desirable. Consequently, none of us, in any of our disciplines, has ever taken the trouble to develop a theory of equilibrium." . . . "Some feminists are almost amusing when they talk about greater opportunities for women because one would think from their oratory that all or most American women are miserable servants whose weary selves contain the stuff of brain surgeons and astrophysicists."

In fact, however, most women -- if they had not become wives and mothers -- would be doing the same repetitious little jobs that are the fate of most men. A central weakness of women's liberation is that it is sparked partly by women who have had bad luck with their fathers and/or husbands. They are women who have fostered a worthy cause but who sabotage that cause with a stupid and bitchy absolutism. They don't know where to stop." (Edwin A. Roberts Jr. in the National Observer). . Beneath the surface evidence of a "freakish" youth culture, real attitude changes have been taking place. Irreverence may be one of the legacies of the protest movement, but so, it seems, are openness and a new tolerance. (From Education Abstracts).

FACULTY SCHOLAR AWARDS

The Josiah Macy Jr. Foundation announces a new program of awards to faculty members in schools of medicine and public health designed to recognize and further the development of academic excellence. The awards will support a period of concentrated research and scholarship at an institution other than that of the candidate in the United States, or abroad. Members of all departments in schools of medicine and public health may apply. The awards will ordinarily be for a period of one year, but may be for a shorter period.

The amount of the grant will be adjusted to the needs of the Scholars according to their resources and the scope of their studies. The funds may be used to supplement full or partial salaries during sabbatical leaves. Other fellowships may not be held concurrently with the Macy grant.

Applications will be evaluated by a Selection Committee which will recommend candidates to the foundation for appointment. The first awards will be effective July 1, 1974, with the deadline for submission of applications being October 1, 1973. The next group of awards will be effective July 1, 1975, with deadline of June 1, 1974.
