We want to know what's on your mind

See that big white space to the right? We reserve it for letters to the editor. Sadly, it's empty this week.

I say "sadly" because that space makes me think of all the people who've missed their chance this week to let us know what's on their minds. And by doing so, they've deprived me of a chance to make the Sagamore a better paper.

That saddens me because, like all my predecessors in this worn-out chair, I want to make this a better paper in part by making it more responsive to the needs, desires, frustrations and exaltations of the people who read it. And I can't respond to what I don't know about.

You see, there's more to a "letter to the editor" than meets the eye (or, this week, doesn't meet the eye): it's more than something to fill up that white space. When I get a letter, I don't just read it, touch it up or trim it down as necessary and put it in the typesetters' "in" bin.

Instead, I ask myself a few questions about the topic — or, I should say, the problem — the letter addresses. (Funny thing: people seldom write about what makes them happy.) I ask myself questions such as these: Is the matter only an isolated incident, or a recurrent problem? Did the writer do something to precipitate the problem, or did it arise from "business as usual"? Is it unfair that someone should have to put up with the problem, or is it an inevitable consequence of attending a large institution like this one, with all its bureaucratic and administrative complexities? I ask myself, in sum, whether the problem might be solved or prevented — for the next person, at least, if not the writer — through applying the power of the press.

You might ask, "What 'power' is this guy talking about?" Well, I'm talking about the power that all news media possess. As the term "news medium" implies, a paper stands between the news and the people who want to read it. We tend to think of the media as extensions, so to speak, of the mouths of the people who make the news. But there's another side to this intermediary business, this middle-person posture: the media also serve as extensions of the readers' ears and eyes. Thus when a Sagamore reporter asks questions, examines documents, looks for the story behind the story, he or she is acting on your behalf.

That's why we want to know what's on your mind. We come up with a lot of questions on our own, but we can't be everywhere, and we don't always know about everything that's going on.

So please, folks, keep — or start — writing those letters. I want to do a better job.

Also, I don't like all that white space.

Quality of education, funding topics of Ryan address

by Eileen F. Worcester

The need for quality in higher education and new possibilities for attaining it were major topics of the annual State of the University address delivered Sept. 13 by Indiana University President John W. Ryan.

inflation on our capacity to maintain quality and accessibility in higher education is bearing the fruit of our effort."

Ryan stated that raising public consciousness of the need for quality in higher education is a goal of the IU Administration, since recent attention has been directed toward primary and secondary education in Indiana. For the past two years, the legislature limited allocations of funds for higher education. But with the economy in Indiana picking up, Ryan stated, now is the time to approach the legislature for needed funds.

"Compacency invites academic deterioration," Ryan stated, "and now is the time to act."

IU has developed several programs to facilitate learning and research in the higher education process.

In order to bridge the gap between high school and college, programs have also been designed to better prepare high school students for college work.

Along with the preparation courses for high school students, the university has created a special faculty task force that will investigate matters pertaining to higher education, meet with community leaders, and act as a sounding board for university-related problems.

Ryan also noted the growing bond between Indiana University and Purdue University. Both IU and Purdue will work to reciprocate, each offering degrees unique to the specific school, in order to enhance higher education in the state.

"Indiana University will continue to look into higher education, as well as primary and secondary education, to ensure a quality standard of education in the state," Ryan said.

Ryan's address to the University emphasized a need for high standards in academics and research as well as for gaining financial support from the General Assembly to ensure quality education in the Indiana system.

"Education underlies the prosperity of the country," Ryan stated, "and educational ferment is to be cherished."

Center offers evening care for children of students

IUPUI offers several free services that few students seem to know about. One is the Child Enrichment Center, which the Student Assembly this year established for students who need child care while they attend evening classes.

Kim Graves, who established and operates the center, told the Sagamore that the center is intended for children ages 3 through 9. Children will be kept amused and occupied, she said, with coloring books and games such as Musical Chairs, Games of Hangman and Scrabble will augment the vocabulary of older children, for whom help with homework is also available. Children will be closely supervised while at the center, she said.

"I worked for a pediatrician, and I saw a lot of children," said Graves, explaining why she established the center. "I like to see them happy — I like to spend time with children."

Located adjacent to the Hide-away in the basement of University Library, the center is open Monday through Thursday from 3:15 to 9:15 p.m. For further information call Graves at 264-2583 or 264-3907.

ethics opinion by Wayne C. Olson

Inward response due to ethical development

Think back to the moment you first heard about the shooting down of the Korean plane. What controlled your mind and heart? Anger? Revulsion? Desire for vengeance? Concern for the victims and their families? Did you give a second to thinking about the person or persons who actually fired that "shot heard 'round the world'?"

Your first impulse reveals more about your ethical values than you might wish to admit. Fortunately, the later impulses, those tempered by reflection and time, determine behavior.

This was evident, I think, in President Reagan's handling of the crisis. His television speech to the nation called for a more restrained response than his initial remarks had led some of the more revenge-minded to expect.

It is difficult to imagine that anyone would condone the downing of this plane; still more difficult to imagine anyone firing the missile.

Yet the Russian gunners obeyed orders, having double- and even triple-checked to make sure they were hearing them aright. What can we say to them to assuage their consciences? They must live with the memory of that awful moment of encounter. Surely they themselves are not happy with what they were ordered to do, and did. If they are, then such happiness is predicated on values and ethics totally incompatible with any you and I are comfortable with.

But what of your behavior during this crisis? Are you comfortable with the positions you have taken, the words you have spoken to family and friends? Have you hastily encouraged actions you might, upon reflection, discourage? What do your own words and actions say to you about your perceptions of what is ultimately good and right? How much of what we "want" in such a moment of crisis comes from our damaged egos rather than our compassionate hearts?

I ask you again to think back to your very first reaction, for that is what you must examine in the quiet of your soul. That reaction is a clue to your own stage of ethical development.

Note: Olson, a Guest Writer for the Sagamore, is Director of the Metropolitan Indianapolis Campus Ministry. This is the second in a series of columns on ethics.

HUMOR

by Greg Petropoulos

I live next door to Mrs. Olsen and across the street from Robert Young. As you might imagine, it's not always pleasant. Yesterday, for example, I was up early making breakfast. Frying bacon, scrambling eggs, and brewing coffee. I sweated over the stove. My wife gobbled up the bacon and eggs. But when I took some more to the dining room, I noticed she hadn't even touched her coffee.

Dejected, I slouched back into the kitchen. A few seconds later, Mrs. Olsen was at the back door.

"Good morning, Greg. It is a lovely morning, isn't it? . . . Why, what's wrong?"

"I don't know, Mrs. Olsen. Lee Ann drank four cups of coffee last night at your place, but this morning she wouldn't even sniff the coffee I made."

"Poor dear, maybe she couldn't sleep last night." She paused. "Or maybe you didn't use Folgers!"

"Folgers?" I asked.

"Yes, it's mountain grown . . ."

Meanwhile, in the dining room, Robert Young stood before the bay window, chatting with my wife.

"Ho ho! What a glorious day!" Lee Ann said nothing. Suddenly his face was full of fatherly concern. "What's wrong, Lee Ann?"

"Oh, I'm just a little uptight lately. The Keebler Elves ruined our walnut tree in the backyard. I don't know why we let them stay back there. You'd think we'd get some sort of discount on crackers, at the very least. But no!"

"Yesterday, a white tornado smashed into the china cabinet, and this morning, I found the Man from Glad trying on my nightgown in the bedroom closet. I'm a nervous wreck, and it's no wonder!"

Young grinned. "It could be your coffee. Sounds like you're getting too much caffeine. You should be drinking Sanka brand."

"Oh no you shouldn't!" screamed Mrs. Olsen. She stormed out of the kitchen, balancing two cups and saucers in her left hand. "You should be drinking Folgers! Its mountain grown flavor really . . ."

"Now hold on there, dear lady," Young interrupted. "What this girl needs is a hot cup of Sanka!"

"Folgers!"

"Sanka!"

"Folgers, I say! You pompous geezer!"

"Sanka! You wrinkled windbag!"

Soon they were spitting and clawing at each other like two alley cats. The sight of two senior citizens rolling on the dining-room floor was too much for my wife. I was rather intrigued by the wrestling match, but she led me away and up the stairs. She stopped on the landing.

"We have got to get out of here before we go crazy," she said.

"You're right," I said, looking out the window. "By the way, we don't have American Express, do we?"

"You know we don't. Why?"

"Because Karl Malden is walking up the drive, and he sure as hell isn't going to let us leave home without it!"

Whether your goal is brushing up on the basics or perfecting your writing style and skills, the staff of the Writing Center in CA 427 can help. Instructors provide guidance and can bolster your efforts with one-on-one counseling sessions. Instruction is available to students at all levels and from any school.

Directed by Professor Barbara Cambridge, the center is open Monday through Thursday from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m., Friday 9 a.m. to 3 p.m. and Saturday from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. with at least one of five instructors on duty to help. Marie K. Hill, Sue Fonten, Annette Phoren, Pam Zale and Barbara Zimmer who staff the center are available to help with class papers, essays, resumes, letters or creative pieces at any stage of work a student needs help. Although students are welcome at any time during open hours, calling 264-2049 or stopping by to make an appointment eliminates waiting and assures students of help at a convenient time.

In addition to the daily counseling, the center holds mini-workshops for concentration on specific types of writing projects. The next workshop is scheduled for Sept. 19 at 1 p.m. and held in CA 427. Entitled "Revising? Editing? Proofreading?" this one-hour workshop provides guidance for refining and putting finishing touches on written work for either graduate or undergraduate students.

Trustees told of problems with counseling, parking

by Mitzel Shepherd

The Student Affairs Committee and the Campus Advisory Board met with the IU Board of Trustees Friday, Sept. 9 to report problems and plans for the 1983-84 school year. Representatives from Kokomo, Richmond, Ft. Wayne, Bloomington and Indianapolis campuses attended.

IUPUI student body president George Graves reported that he had been receiving complaints in regard to academic counseling. He expressed his desire on behalf of his fellow students for changes to be made in counseling methods. Both advisory board and student representatives agreed the service could be improved but the two groups also acknowledged that both students and the university need to play an active role in the improvement.

Carolyn Gutman, campus advisory board member for the Ft. Wayne campus, agreed that effective counseling is lacking. "I think the students can help with recommendations about that," she said and asked for suggestions.

In addition to counseling problems, the ever-present lack of parking spaces was discussed. Before the 1982-83 academic year, student parking was increased by 168 spaces plus garage space. The money students pay for parking at the beginning of each semester funds the building of more parking lots as no state funds cover parking lot construction.

These topics currently under consideration by the Advisory Board and Trustees will be topics for further discussion at their next meeting this fall.
