THE FUND FOR AMERICAN HISTORY

AN ENDOWMENT CAMPAIGN OF THE ORGANIZATION OF AMERICAN HISTORIANS

The Fund for American History is now in its second year. Readers of the OAH Newsletter are perhaps familiar with this regular column explaining The Fund's goals and recognizing its benefactors. Some have responded generously to special requests for support during the past year; most will have an opportunity to pledge, make a bequest, or contribute directly to the endowment campaign in response to a general mailing early this autumn. The Fund now amounts to $300,000—an auspicious beginning on our way to a goal of $1,200,000 by 1992.

Endowment funds play a substantially different role in the life of the Organization from membership dues. With ordinary revenues OAH provides standard and traditional services: a journal, a newsletter, an annual meeting, routine prize and service committee work. The Fund represents venture capital, an opportunity for American historians to invest in the future of their profession and their discipline. We believe members will be generous as they consider the many needs we hope to address.

JUST FOR THE FUND OF IT AUCTION

JUST FOR THE FUND OF IT asks members to participate more directly in this endowment campaign by donating goods and/or services to a benefit auction. Many members are collectors of various kinds of political memorabilia and might be willing, as are two Executive Board members, to part with cherished historical campaign posters. Some may wish to donate rare books, maps, prints, photographs, coins, first editions, autographs or letters. Microform or other documentary collections no longer needed by one scholar might afford a rare opportunity to another, or to a growing research library. Other members might enjoy donating a service—one who has promised an insider's tour of the Library of Congress. We are hoping institutional members and publishers can also become involved.

The auction's success depends in large part on our ability to advertise the items to be sold. A list will be printed in the OAH Convention Supplement which is published early in 1991. Members contemplating making a donation to the auction are strongly encouraged to return the donor form below to the OAH office by December 1. Scheduled to take place immediately before the Presidential Banquet on Friday, April 12, 1991, at the Galt House in Louisville, JUST FOR THE FUND OF IT will be a celebration of American history and historians.

Phi Beta Kappa and the Rites of Spring

by G. Kurt Piehler

The medieval trappings of commencement ceremonies at colleges and universities across the land underscore the continuing vitality of ritual within these institutions. Some time ago, Eric Hobsbawn observed in The Invention of Tradition (1983) that ritual and tradition, far from being fixed and immutable vestiges of a premodern age, are continually being invented, forgotten, and rediscovered. Richard Current's recent Phi Beta Kappa in American Life (1990) and my own work on the organization's development underscore Hobsbawn's conclusion. Academic traditions and ritual, it would seem, have their own history which frequently mirrors wider changes taking place both in higher education and society at large.

As Current's study (with an "Afterword" by John Hope Franklin) makes clear, Phi Beta Kappa continues as the oldest and most celebrated of this nation's collegiate honor societies. Now established on some 240 campuses, the Society receives scores of applications in its triennial review cycle from other colleges and universities seeking to 'shelter' their own chapter. To most Americans, Phi Beta Kappa conjures up images of college life and academic achievement while its golden key is a widely recognized symbol.

The Society was founded in 1776 for quite different purposes. Originally, the small group of William and Mary students who conceived Phi Beta Kappa created it as a secret, student-run fraternity. There was nothing particularly radical or innovative about their actions—literary societies were and remained a common feature of American college life during the colonial period and the early nineteenth century. These organizations not only offered students comradeship but also provided a place for them to develop writing and speaking skills that could not be gained from the prevailing classical curriculum which emphasized memorization and translation of Graeco-Roman masterpieces. Phi Beta Kappa, for example, required an oath of secrecy of its members in order to encourage its free-wheeling debates and discussions of such topics as: "Whether Religion is necessary in Government," "Whether Commonwealths or Monarchies are more subject to seditions and commotions," and "Whether hath a wise State any Interest nearer at heart than the education of Youth."

Had it not been for the decision of the members of the original William and Mary chapter to create brother organizations at Harvard and Yale, Phi Beta Kappa might well have disappeared and been forgotten. The British invasion of Virginia in 1781 terminated the meetings of the Williamsburg chapter until well into the next century, when they were interrupted again by the arrival of General McClellan's armies in 1862. Phi Beta Kappa endured and even multiplied in New England where it continued for some time to function as a student and alumni literary society. For instance, at Harvard the Society sponsored debates among members, created a fund for financially distressed brothers, maintained a small library, and sponsored an annual dinner which featured an oration.

It remains part of a larger movement on the part of traditional elites to use ritual and tradition to legitimize their position in American society.

In the course of the nineteenth century, however, the role of students in the Society diminished in relation to that of the faculty and alumni. Although the student members at Harvard continued to elect new members to the chapter, they increasingly relied on college rankings to make their decisions. When new chapters of Phi Beta Kappa were established in other institutions after 1820, student participation in the selection process at those campuses was ended or tightly regulated. At Bowdoin, for example, faculty control was insured by the decision to swear in newly-elected members only on the day after they graduated. The diminishing role of students in the governance of Phi Beta Kappa encouraged the steady decline and eventual disappearance of most chapter literary activities. Soon many simply met just once a year to initiate new members and hear an oration. Moreover, at Harvard and at other chapters a graduating senior or recent graduate no longer delivered the annual address; instead, the honor went to older, more distinguished alumni such as Ralph Waldo Emerson. The transition sapped some of the Society's former vibrancy so that when Phi Beta Kappa celebrated its centennial in 1876 it still existed at only a handful of colleges centered mostly in the Northeast and Ohio.

After 1883, the Society experienced a phenomenal epoch of growth. A national governing body, the United Chapters, was created in that year and set about standardizing Phi Beta Kappa's procedures and advancing its aims. Some chapters, moreover, even attempted to revive the Society's traditional undergraduate activities under the watchful eye of the faculty or a college president.

What rescued Phi Beta Kappa from the threat of near extinction and what accounted for its renewed popularity? To a large degree, it remains part of a larger movement on the part of traditional elites to use ritual and tradition to legitimize their position in American society. A number of historians have documented how in the late nineteenth century these elites formed a series of new genealogically-based patriotic societies, such as the Daughters of the American Revolution, sponsored massive civic pageants to commemorate national holidays and anniversaries, and showed a marked interest in preserving historic sites as museums.

To some extent, Phi Beta Kappa served to "popularize" academic achievement both within the college community and the wider society. Although a college degree came to be viewed as a prerequisite by the middle and upper classes, many questioned the value of the curriculum. In The Rutgers Picture Book (1985), Michael Moffatt noted that in the late nineteenth century college students devoted the bulk of their time not to intellectual endeavors, but to an extensive range of extracurricular pursuits—fraternities, athletic...
Sixty-Five Boxes: New York State Police Surveillance Files

by Gerda W. Ray

Sixty-five boxes of New York State Police political surveillance files have been open to researchers at the New York State Archives in Albany for the last ten years. Their formal title is Records of Investigations of Non-Criminal Activities, and the biggest surprise is that they even exist. The State Archives successfully used arguments based on FOIA to preserve many of the files. Their modest victory should set a precedent for the retention of state surveillance files, though it suggests some of the limitations.

The files were the product of official policies carried out by a sophisticated police department. The New York State Police has been responsible for gathering information since its creation in 1917. This function became more important in the late 1930s, with the creation of the Subversives Unit (later called the Special Services section) within the Bureau of Criminal Investigation (BCI) of the State Police. The BCI, a centralized detective division, had been set up in 1935 at the same time as the first state crime laboratory in New York. These sixty-five cartons of files are what is currently available of the records of the Special Services section.

The BCI was one of many examples of the leading role of the New York State Police in modernizing police work in the 1930s. Its Training School, one of the earliest formal police schools in the country, was adopted as a model for the entire nation by specialists at the University of Chicago. The New York State Police started using the radio in 1931, installed a transmitter in 1934, and had a radio link with police departments in the Western states by 1936. The Subversives Unit was part of a showcase division of the State Police.

The State Police were responsible for numerous routine investigations required by state law to keep Communists and subversives out of the Civil Service and other positions. In the 1960s, in addition to investigating possible subversives and applicants for jobs, and cooperating with the House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC) the State Police were also directed by the State Legislature to investigate the International Workers Order, an insurance company run by the immigrant left, and summer camps for the children of trade unionists.

The New York State Police have worked especially closely with the FBI since World War II. Like the FBI, the New York State Police had developed a list of suspected subversives prior to the U.S. entry into the war. The State Police investigative techniques parallel those of the FBI in this period. Both forces used officers posing as newsmen to obtain information, conducted mail covers, both legal and illegal, worked with informers to get copies of private diaries, membership lists, and personal information. They interviewed employers, neighbors, and credit officers. This volume of work and record keeping helps explain how over three-quarters of the FBI intelligence files in 1975 contained information from state and local police. It may be true that the FBI played a larger role in political surveillance than state and local police until the 1960s, but they did so with extensive help from other departments.

Many files ... are now simply empty, with no note of explanation, like the six empty folders marked "Case 113: Security Intelligence."

Increased administrative oversight in the 1960s corresponded with the period of fastest growth in surveillance. When Governor Rockefeller called for the reorganization of the State Police in 1961, he increased the influence of the FBI. Arthur Cornelius, Jr., his choice for Superintendent, was not only the first Superintendent from outside the force, but also a former assistant to J. Edgar Hoover and a special agent of the FBI. Cornelius expanded and reorganized State Police operations, greatly increasing the level of centralization.

The objects of State Police surveillance in the 1960s included the NAACP, Nation of Islam, Black Panthers, Venceremos Brigade, antihar groups, and many others. As in previous decades, both their targets and their techniques mirrored those of the FBI. The connection with the FBI became even closer in 1967 when the State Police computerized its files and was chosen as the link to the FBI's criminal identification files. Possibly, a close examination of the files will reveal something about the impact of this rapid computerization on the collection and storage of political intelligence.

Ironically, it seems to have been the passage of New York's FOIA in 1974 that both led to the initial effort of the State Police to destroy the files and made possible the State Archive's success in preserving at least some of the files. In many other states and cities, the passage of FOIA precipitated the hurried and often unauthorized destruction of old surveillance files.

What is different about the New York State Police is that they followed state records management laws and filed a records disposition request in February 1975. The State Archivist promptly objected to the destruction on the grounds of "significant historical value." The State Police countered that the files were obsolete, confidential, and should be destroyed.

While the disagreement over the disposition continued, the office of the Superintenent moved quickly to remove certain materials from the files. I found "file borrowed" forms dated mid-October 1975 in the files for ex-governor Herbert H. Lehman, NAACP, the John Birch Society, and the American Labor Party. In addition to file contents removed according to procedures, there are also many files which are now simply empty, with no note of explanation, like the six empty folders marked "Case 113: Security Intelligence."

In December 1975, in response to a court order barring destruction of the files, the State Police insisted that no files had been destroyed. Since some files concerned criminal (as distinct from non-criminal) investigations and were retained by the State Police, there may be no clear way to know how intact the Police left the files.

While the Archives and the State Police were arguing disposition, and the police were weeding, the director of the Office of Legislative Oversight and Analysis, William F. Haddad, notified the press. The furor was intense but short-lived. Haddad condemned the files as a "political dossier system," but the State Police and former Governors were quick to deny any political purpose to the files. The Superintendent of State Police, William G. Connelie, defended purging the files because they were "too bulky and not economical." Despite having been in the State Police for thirty years before his appointment as Superintendent,... in July 1975, Connelie was quoted as saying, "I don't know why they were collected. They weren't used, and they have no value." His predecessor, William E. Kirwan, Jr., who had been Superintendent from 1967 to 1975, downplayed the importance of the files: "These are police files. Every police department has some kind of files."

The politicians went further in their denials. The New York Times summarized: "Former Govs. Nelson Rockefeller and Malcolm Wilson said they had never heard of such files, and Governor Carey said he had been told the files consisted 'mostly of trash.'"

In light of the Rockefeller-initiated reorganization of the Bureau of Criminal Investigation, and the traditional use of the State Police to investigate governmental employees, it is not credible that the Special Services Unit had operated in such obscurity. It is, however, possible that these paper files, only a small proportion of which contained information in any way relevant to the second half of the 1970s, were no longer useful to the police.

While the Legislature established a Task Force to investigate the State Police files, the State Police reached an agreement with the State Archives to transfer the files to the State Records Center for inactive storage until January 1980. The State Police may have hoped that this agreement would bolster their refusal to open the files to the Task Force, but they did not realize that they had acknowledged that the State Archives would have control over the files in 1980.

The Task Force started with high expectations that it would operate with subpoena power and, after investigation and open hearings, draft legislation to prevent excessive police surveillance. Instead, it never managed to get a subpoena, which meant that it wrote its entire 64-page Report without looking at the files. The report concluded ambiguously: "Although we have found several apparent violations of law, we have found no pattern of illegal acts in the conduct of their intelligence operations."

They concluded that the police had not engaged in undercover operations, but their own fact-finding generated examples of police attending meetings and demonstrations in plainclothes strictly for intelligence gathering. They asserted that the State Police did not harass individuals, but their report included many instances of police interviews with store owners who sold radical publications, and the employers, friends and contacts of individuals under surveillance. The Report bemoaned its inability to find a record of how the State Police disseminated information, but they concluded nevertheless that it only released information to law enforcement agencies, despite its own evidence that police shared information with college officials.

The Superintendent of State Police... defended purging the files because they were "too bulky and not economical."

The Task Force held only one public meeting. Superintendent Connelie used the Report to argue that there was no need for "a lot of useless things to be put into statutes," especially in light of the upcoming Winter Olympics at Lake Placid. "Please do not make it possible for another Munich to occur," he said, linking the work of the State Police to defense against international terrorists. (The Los Angeles Police Department used the 1984 Olympics in a similar fashion to stifle critics and upgrade its surveillance operations.) The impact of what New York magazine called a "whitewash" was that the significance, and even the existence, of the State Police files was forgotten by all except the State Archives.

The Report had claimed that the files were now useless. The New York Times reporter said that the files "are now in a state warehouse awaiting destruction," and the New York magazine stated dramatically, "With the non-criminal files now on the eve of being destroyed, the true extent of New York State Police surveillance may never be known."

In January 1980 the Archives contacted the State Police to arrange to take custody of the files as had been agreed to in 1975. The State Police objected, and asked that the Archives seal the records for fifty-five years. Citing New York's FOIA, which specifically excludes criminal, but not non-criminal, law enforcement records, the Archives insisted upon the right to access. The State Police countered by trying to have the records returned to their custody, and then contacted the Education Department to pressure the State Archives into sealing the records.

The Archives resisted this pressure, and it now makes the records available for research with restrictions only on the publication of individuals' names, particularly those of informers. The files are disorganized and hard to use, but Archivist Tom Mills estimates that one professional, with clerical and technical help from three other people, could arrange and describe the files in about a month. Since these files make up less than one percent of the Archives files which are not yet described, and since there is unlikely to be federal money to do this work, cataloging the files will require some initiative. It will be worth the effort.

Gerda Ray, a graduate student at the University of California, Berkeley, is completing a thesis on the creation of the New York State Police.

William Appleman Williams

William Appleman Williams, a former president of the Organization of American Historians, died on March 5, 1990, at the age of 68. He had recently retired after eighteen years at Oregon State University. Born in Atlantic, Iowa, Williams was the son of a World War I pilot who later died in the crash of an airplane he was testing for the army. A graduate of the U.S. Naval Academy in 1943, Williams served in the Pacific theater. Badly injured by a concussion from a Japanese shell that exploded nearby while he was trying to dislodge his landing craft during an amphibious operation, Williams was later medically discharged from the navy.

From 1946 to 1950, Williams studied for the doctorate at the University of Wisconsin. His major professor was Fred Harvey Harrington. After brief teaching stints at Washington and Jefferson, Ohio State, and the University of Oregon, Williams returned to Madison in 1957. For a decade he trained graduate students and taught large numbers of undergraduates to think about American foreign relations in a new way.

Williams first shocked the historical profession with the publication of American-Russian Relations, 1781-1947 (1952). Appearing at the height of the Cold War, this expanded revision of his doctoral thesis challenged the basic tenets of the containment doctrine, but like many first books, American-Russian Relations did not receive a lot of attention. And it has still not appeared in a paperback edition. But Williams' second book, The Tragedy of American Diplomacy (1959) received a great deal of attention—right from the start. Adolf Berle gave it respectful reviews. But newsmen were not drawn to material for which, in the brown years, there was no audience. The New York Times did not enter its review the Sunday Book Review of the New York Times. But academic reviews brought forth scathing comments from outraged critics who decried this distorted version of the nation's emergence to power. Later critics suggested that the Vietnam War was responsible for this "revisionist" outlook; in fact, Tragedy implied the likelihood of such a denouement as a logical outcome of American self-deceptions.

The Contours of American History (1961) provided readers with yet another new way of looking at the American past, and drew from its traditions of community as well as individualism. Williams bridged conflict and consensus interpretations of American history. And he always insisted that ideas about social and political institutions were as important as the institutions themselves.

Not content with traditional leftist "economic" interpretations of American imperialism, Williams spent the next few years researching a new project, The Roots of the Modern American Empire: A Study of Growth and Shaping of Social Consciousness in a Marketplace Society (1965). Instead of the traditional interpretation of imperialism as the product of a mature industrial society (for whatever reasons), Williams posited the growth of American foreign expansion as an outcome of ideas and needs associated with the transition from an agrarian to an industrial society. A massively documented book, The Roots of Modern American Empire answered criticisms that Williams neglected traditional scholarly methods—only to be met with reviews that charged him with pedantry.

After leaving Madison, Williams turned back to interpretive essays in his later years. Some Presidents: Wilson to Nixon (1972) was a collection of essays from the New York Review of Books, while America Confronts a Revolutionary World 1776-1976 (1976) and Empire as a Way of Life: An Essay of the Cause and Character of America's Present Predicament Along with a Few Thoughts about an Alternative (1980), were written from the vantage point of the Oregon seacoast as a background for suggestions about decentralizing American power and restructing local and regional responsibility.

William Appleman Williams never subscribed to any orthodoxy—not even those projected about his own writings. His was a powerful influence reshaping the way academics and laymen thought about their nation and them. His was a clarion call. He insisted if everyone agreed with him, but as he said many times, he accepted responsibility for what he wrote without regrets and without apologies.

Charles M. Wiltse

Born in 1907 in San Francisco, Charles M. Wiltse moved as a teenager to West Virginia, where he earned a degree in history from West Virginia University in 1929. He came under the influence of Charles Ambler, author of several studies on Virginia politics and journalism in the early republic. He then went to Cornell. Although he knew Carl Becker, his mentor was the philosopher George Sabine. Wiltse's dissertation on the Jeffersonian tradition in American democracy provided the basis for several scholarly journals and in 1935 a book from the University of North Carolina Press. For Wiltse, the New Deal represented a twentieth-century application of Jeffersonian thought, a conception warmly embraced by liberals and equally rejected by conservatives.

Despite its controversial thesis, The Jeffersonian Tradition in American Democracy received strong notices, and made Wiltse's reputation as a student of American thought. The book has never gone out of print. This reputation did not translate into a job during the Depression, however. For a year Wiltse worked on his family's hardscrabble farm in rural Ohio and in 1934 he gave up the quest for an academic post and took a clerical job at the National Resources Planning Board. Subsequently he held a series of administrative positions in the federal bureaucracy, culminating from 1960 to 1967 as chief historian of the Army Medical Service.

Wiltse's commitment to scholarship never flagged, even during years when responsibilities in government were essentially administrative. In the late 1930s he decided to write a biography of John C. Calhoun. He published volume one to critical acclaim in 1944 and subsequently quit his job in Washington to work full-time on the Calhoun project. "I had planned to write one volume," he once said, "but soon realized that it couldn't be done in a volume. So I let the material direct me as much as I shaped it." Working 12 to 16 hours a day on a regular basis, living off his savings and whatever grants he could win, Wiltse produced one of the monuments of early republic scholarship.

The appearance of the Calhoun volumes, the last of which was made possible by a two-year Guggenheim Fellowship, cemented Wiltse's reputation as a leader in his field. In subsequent years he frequently spoke at scholarly meetings, contributed many reviews, and in 1961 wrote The New Nation, 1800-1845. Although he taught occasional courses part time, he did not secure a full-time academic position until 1966. Dartmouth College was planning to publish a select-lecturepress edition of Daniel Webster's papers and offered Wiltse the editorship. A comprehensive microfilm edition of the papers appeared in 1971, and in 1974 the first of fifteen volumes appeared to universally good notices. Completion of the final volumes was celebrated in 1989 at an event that included a speech by Chief Justice William Rehnquist. Wiltse read every word of the volumes edited by others, made numerous changes, and edited two of the final volumes in the series.

Wiltse's death this spring after a long struggle with cancer not only saddened the long-term staff members who had remained in contact with Evelyn since her retirement, but also the end of an entire era of the transformation of the Organization of American Historians from a regional to a national professional association.

Evelyn Leffler had much to do with that transfor- mation because she worked for three different Executive Secretaries—Tom Clark, Richard Kirkendall and me. As Clark recalled when he first hired her: "I interviewed at least a dozen applicants with negative reactions ... but when Evelyn came along there was enthusiastic agreement that she was the one." Indeed, she did prove to be the one. Prior to her work for the OAH, she had been head of the admissions office at the Indiana University Law School and remains the only staff person ever to receive a distinguished service award from the Law School. She also was the only staff person to receive an honorary OAH life membership. Many of you will recall that the OAH hosted a special reception at the 1982 annual meeting in her honor.

Upon her retirement both former OAH presidents Richard Leopold and Frank Friedel wrote heartfelt tributes to her commenting on how great a debt the Organization owed her as the mainstay of all presidents for almost a decade. Others described her as a "whirling dervish of efficiency," and I can only reiter- ate that my first year as Executive Secretary would have been a disaster without her. Her vitality, genera- xis, and skills continued to impress me after she retired and she will always remain my ideal model of an executive assistant. Evelyn Leffler's death at the age of 69 marks the passing of an entire generation of older leadership to whom the OAH owes more than it can ever repay.

To the Editor:

"History and the Public Schools"—I knew when I saw the title for Professor Robert Ferrell's article [OAH Newsletter, February 1990] that if I started reading my blood would boil, but I read on anyway. I would strongly suggest that if Professor Ferrell and other college and university professors really wish to improve the teaching of history on the secondary level, they should stop saying " Ain't it awful," and get out into the schools. Unless you are going to be there, unless you spend at least four to five days in a school, I cannot see why anyone should listen to the complaints of "victims.

History in the public schools is in serious trouble—but what to do about it? Other institutions beside the public schools, their teachers and their students share some blame here. But certainly we are not victims in this situation in which history and learning in general is devalued in the society at large. Individual action is not useless. It will not change the world, but it is not useless. By the time a student reaches the senior year whom Ferrell finds thumbing through the textbook, a good part of her experience and love of scholarship. His motivation is looking for an end; he considers his place to learn less because of the previous preparation of students.

Darwin Kelley

To the Editor:

Concerning Ferrell, "History in the Public Schools," the problem appears at the beginning—no provision is made for those in the public school who combine experience and love of scholarship. His motivation is looking for an end; he considers his place to learn less because of the previous preparation of students.

To the Editor:

If we all agreed with Professor Ferrell that "individual action appears useless" what hope would we have for the future of our educational system? I am only one of many who are passionately dedicated to enriching high school history in ways that go well beyond the use of less-than-adequate textbooks. I believe in demanding more of high school students and getting in return young adults who have a solid grasp of the history of their country and their responsibilities as citizens, and who are prepared to enter college-level history courses should they chose to do so.

I urge professors to get involved and not wait for "invitations to visit public school classrooms." The educational crisis in the United States is the responsibility of us all.

Lori Clune

To the Editor:

In the February issue, Robert H. Ferrell wrote movingly of his concern over the ignorance of college freshmen about American History. My first response was to rush to the defense of fellow teachers, since I have taught U.S. History at both public and private schools in New York and now California. But then I remembered as a dean of students how I had so often heard the same kinds of stories about students at a prestigious Eastern college which accepts only those who have proven themselves academically outstanding.

Professor Ferrell does indeed have a series of valid points. Even though we teachers at most levels tend to blame student ignorance for whatever lack of success we may periodically feel, history teaching reflects our cultural interpretations in many ways that most of the modern academic disciplines. "Dumbed down" textbooks, misplaced teachers and professorial inattention to relieve the situation in the elementary and secondary schools certainly do not help our students in their historical studies.

But I also like to think in terms of the Advanced Placement essays in U.S. History I read in New Jersey two summers ago. Students from fifty states and from international schools throughout the world, publicly and privately educated, wrote essays in answer to a variety of rather interesting historical questions. By and large those 83,000 students wrote essays that were clear, competent and demonstrated a solid base of understanding. Serious students do exist.

To the Editor:

Gerald George's article discussed a subject that needs to be brought into the open—namely, the old "academy versus public history" tug-of-war that has museum professionals and librarians across the country taking philosophical sides.

While there are, indeed, some cases of historical breeches of ethics can happen in those historical societies that remain elitist, private enclaves. We are just less likely to know about these situations.

James W. Goodrich, Director
The State Historical Society of Missouri

To the Editor:

Some clarification is in order regarding Gerald George's "Historical Society Upheavals" (OAH Newsletter, February 1990). As an example of "upheaval," he uses the Missouri Historical Society located in St. Louis and implies incorrectly that it is a state historical society. The State Historical Society of Missouri has been housed since its inception in 1898 on the campus of the University of Missouri-Columbia. It is supported, in the main, by state appropriations and it is open without charge to the public regardless of age or profession.

I have been associated with the Society since 1965 and during that time it has never experienced any of the more severe troubles recounted in George's article.

To the Editor:

I wholeheartedly agree with Professor Ferrell's views with respect to the need for improving the teaching of American history in the public schools. Yet, in all fairness, ignorance of American history does not entirely lie squarely on the shoulders of the teacher and student.

With the exception of Advanced Placement History courses, the official course of study is that of "social studies," a catch-all title. The adoption of that course of study tended to water down the significance and meaning of history. During the 1960s the magical world "relevant" was to be the key to teaching social studies.

Students have been trained to rely heavily upon a textbook and encyclopedia for information, with outside readings limited to reviews of two books. Not all students have been properly trained to discipline themselves to read a book or to research a topic for a paper. By the time a student reaches the senior in high school, much less college, it becomes a struggle for a student to undo some of his/her poor study habits.

To the Editor:

I read with great interest Professor Ferrell's piece on the state of high school history programs. He is right to worry about students' ignorance of their nation's history.

The question on the mind of the eleventh grader whom Ferrell finds thumbing through the textbook is "Why do I have to learn this stuff?" Not a bad question. What incentive do colleg­ es and universities, or the U.S. government, or society give to the student of history? Most jobs, including the most lucrative ones, require little knowledge of history. Grants and scholarships for history students are scarce. The road to a history Ph.D. is long and expensive. History takes students down the road to the present and, ideally, prepares and empowers them to travel the road into the future. This dimension is nearly absent from high school discussions. Teachers must use every available minute preparing students for achievement tests; school budgets do not provide adequate funds; and, textbooks mainly chronicle names and dates.

As historians, we realize that asking the right questions is the key to useful research. I would suggest that Professor Ferrell begin not with the question, "When did the Lusitania sink?" but with "How can we best explain the value of knowing history to the eleventh grader?"

Reaching Out:
An Agenda for Academic Historians in the 1990s

by Ralph D. Gray

In a recent article I likened the experience of publishing in academic journals to that of casting stones into a bottomless well—there is simply no response, other than the obligatory letter from an administrator acknowledging (sometimes with ill-suppressed surprise) the receipt of an offprint. Sometimes, too, a relative—your own, or perhaps that of a person mentioned in the essay—will write, but usually the act of publication goes unnoticed and unremarked upon by anyone outside of peer review committees and immediate family members.

Lest this be regarded an idiosyncratic experience, let me add that I have been conducting an informal poll among colleagues and acquaintances. Most seemed taken back initially—should there have been a response?—but then they can remember—yes, one author recalled a note from a reader whose uncle had been in the same occupation as the subject of an essay, and the person was seeking more information; another remembered that at a meeting a fellow panelist remarked that he was using an article by my interlocutor in his classes. The general pattern of answers to my inquiries, in other words, has left my "bottomless well" theory intact.

Book publications, of course, do elicit formal responses for authors, publishers, and the ubiquitous administrator in the form of published reviews, and occasionally the reviews themselves are the subject of additional colloquies. Recent numbers of the Journal of American History have carried several pages of letters to the editor, indicating among other things perhaps the greater importance that reviews now have in affecting careers. But such responses—reviews and their aftermath—are systematized, not spontaneous, and sometimes carry freight beyond their ostensible purpose.

This is not to say that one's scholarly articles and books are unread, nor is it a plea on behalf of stationers and the postal service for increased letter writing. Rather, it is to suggest that there are additional audiences to be addressed, and that academically trained historians owe it to themselves as well as to the public at large to address those larger audiences. We need to speak not only to our colleagues—the ones seemingly too busy to react to each other's publications because of their own rapidly approaching deadlines—but also to special interest groups, historical societies, civic organizations, ever young people. (I will never forget one letter I received following a visit to an elementary class. One of the students wrote, "Thank you for coming to our class Thursday. I never knew what a dead toad looked like before." I can only hope he was referring to our joint discovery in the park after class.) If we fail to engage the broader audience while talking only to ourselves, then journalists, filmmakers, public relations specialists, perhaps even sports figures will deliver history to the public and influence the way people create historical memory and meaning.

Obviously, the way people outside the academy perceive the work of academicians is not what we would like it to be, nor is it an accurate reflection of the work of the professional historian. One need only point to the popular reception accorded recent, flawed but seemingly plausible criticisms of the education system—works like Alan Bloom's The Closing of the American Mind, E. D. Hirsch, Jr.'s Cultural Literacy, or the scandal-mongering book, Profscam, by C. J. Sykes—to realize that there is little understanding of and even less tolerance for the current academic scene. We must do more to carry the message of history's values and insights to the general public (to say nothing of the general assemblies of other legislative bodies). At the same time, given the enormous popularity of pseudo-historical films (Hollywood's Mississippi Burning and television's Cross of Fire, to name only two recent examples) and historical books and novels by non-historians (again, two recent examples might be David Brinkley's Washington Goes to War and William Safire's Freedom, but one could also cite the career-long productions of James Michener, Gore Vidal or countless others), it is clear that the appetite for history is voracious if not insatiable.

The way people outside the academy perceive the work of academicians is not what we would like it to be.

Still, in the minds of some historians (according to another of the responses to my informal poll), if an article is not unimpeachable to the non-specialist it is not a good article. Clear, lucid prose seems in itself to be self-incriminating. Although obviously this is hyperbole, there is enough truth to it for the author of Profscam to find endless examples of obscurationist, jargon-laden double-talk, what he called "profSpeak." Those who have put aside their Strunk and White, or have yet to make their acquaintance with The Elements of Style, need to place a copy of it front and center on their desks, right next to the dictionary (and the diet drink), and use it frequently.

What else needs to be done? One answer, for me and many others, has been to go outside the academy. I first wandered into this extramural activity somewhat by accident, the byproduct of happening to begin a state history course at the time of the national bicentennial. In partial preparation for the course, I toured the state of Indiana (by motorcycle, but that is another story) and photographed historical sites, monuments, markers, and buildings (using the state's 92 county courthouses as my scorecard). Subsequently, when invited to speak at various places around the state in connection with other events occurring in 1976, I often presented my "bicentennial tour" slidelecture, always spiced with local scenes no matter where we were.

There are, of course, countless other ways to blend the work of the academic and amateur historian. Working with local, county, and state historical societies offers many different kinds of opportunity. Again, in my own case, I have served on the board of two county historical societies. During my first such involvement, the Howard County Historical Society assisted materially in establishing the Elwood Haynes Museum in Kokomo and also acquired new headquarters and museum space for itself in an 1890s Romanesque-mansion. I believe that my limited involvement led to the development of an interpretive area in the Haynes Museum and also assisted in the acquisition of the Seiberling Mansion (which had been my place of employment before the new Indiana University campus in Kokomo was established). Subsequently, during my ongoing tenure on the board of the Marion County/Indianapolis Historical Society, the organization has begun to sponsor a local history conference—the sixth annual was held recently on the campus of Marion College—blending quite successfully, in my judgment, solid academic presentation with papers and performances by non-professionals. The model for these conferences, of course, has been the annual gatherings of professional historians. The Marion County society, barely one generation old, also maintains a modest publication program. In 1987 it ventured into the book market, publishing a manuscript originally prepared by a high school teacher for an interdisciplinary humanities course she was teaching at her school. To our surprise and delight, Indianapolis: The First Century, 1820-1920, by Hester A. Hale, was reviewed in the state magazine of history, and its tough-minded professional reviewer termed it an "interesting introduction," a book that "should be read by anyone interested in the past of one of today's most successful cities."

Additionally, there are opportunities for the professional historian to write for the growing number of so-called popular history magazines. Two recent and successful entries into this form of publication occurred in Ohio and Indiana (Timeline, published by the Ohio Historical Society, and Traces of Indiana and Midwestern History, published by the Indiana Historical Society), and several other states and localities boast of similar publications. There are many other possibilities for communication with the broader community, all of which can serve to break down barriers, to create better understanding between "town and gown," and to bring substance and accuracy to activities with a historical bent that will go on with or without our assistance. I think the former alternative is better.

Finally, to those who say that this is counsel only...
New Collections on the American Presidency

Presidential documents in microform from University Publications of America

President Dwight D. Eisenhower's Office Files, 1953–1961

"[A] treasure trove of evidence on an important modern presidency. Such microfilm collections bring presidential libraries to the scholar's home institution."

Fred I. Greenstein, Professor of Politics, Princeton University

Reproduced from the original documents at the Eisenhower Library at Abilene, Kansas, President Dwight D. Eisenhower's Office Files, 1953–1961 in UPA's ongoing program to micropublish the most valuable presidential files from the Eisenhower years. These files reveal new facts and new directions for research on the administration of one of the nation's most popular chief executives.

Part 1: Eisenhower Administration Series

These incoming and outgoing letters, memos, and reports cover myriad presidential concerns—the economy, foreign relations, national security, politics, social programs, the activities and organization of the federal government, and more. Arranged alphabetically by subject and name, the Administration Series offers an inside view of the day-to-day workings of the administration.

Part 2: International Series

Cables, memos, reports, letters, meeting notes, and printed material reveal new facts about U.S. foreign relations and the Cold War during the 1950s and early 1960s. The collection includes rich correspondence with important American and foreign leaders of the day.

President Harry S Truman’s Office Files, 1945–1953

"These are materials that Truman himself regarded as essential for an understanding of his presidency. Every serious student of that subject must consult them."

Richard S. Kirkendall, The Bullitt Professor of American History, University of Washington

Published from the holdings of the Truman Library in Independence, Missouri, these confidential files shed considerable light on the internal workings of the Truman presidency. They contain important source materials for any serious study of the key issues during his time in office, offering insights on Truman’s political priorities and an intimate personal viewpoint on the man at whose desk “the buck always stopped.”

Truman’s perspectives on the postwar world

The files contribute valuable insights on the rapidly changing face of world affairs following World War II. Confidential memos, correspondence, and reports on a wide range of pressing issues—including the Berlin Crisis, the Nuremberg trials, and Stalin’s Soviet Union—illustrate the shifting balance of international power.

Students and researchers of modern American history will discover a wealth of information on Truman’s domestic policies as well. The collection includes extensive records on the growth of the U.S. economy in peacetime, the divisive steel strikes of the early 1950s, the Red Scare, Truman’s dealings with the Supreme Court, and many other subjects.

A rich file of President Truman’s diaries and handwritten notes allows researchers to study his reflections on issues ranging from foreign policy and the economy to the First Family and his first few days in the White House. Together, these longhand notes and diaries provide a remarkably personal record of Truman’s administration.

The Fight Over "Fair Use": When Is It Safe to Quote?

by Gerald George

Let us say you are a historian sitting in a special-collections library. You are reviewing an exciting letter you have turned up in research for an article or book. It perfectly makes your new point about its author. It also illustrates his or her colorful style. It will give both vivacity and veracity to your manuscript. You must quote it—how can you do without it?

But wait a minute—what will your publisher say? Do you have expression permission to quote the letter? No, and you are not likely to get it. For one thing, the letter sheds negative light on your subject, whose heirs may want to protect his or her angelic image. Even if you find an unprotective heir, will that heir get greedy ideas just because the "erosion" of fair-use principles by the courts. Ian Hamilton had to revise substantial sections of his manuscript. Moreover, it may be hard to find your subject's heirs, or even determine who owns the copyright. The library can identify only the donor of the letter, who was the heir of a recipient of it. Even if you find an unprotective heir, will that heir get greedy ideas just from knowing that you value the letter? Will he or she try to get a stiff fee out of you for permission to quote it, or even try to sell it for publication to someone else?

So what? You can quote it without permission, can you not? You are protected by "fair use": At least limited quoting without permission may be done for purposes of "criticism, comment, news reporting, teaching, scholarship, or research," right? You call your publisher to double-check.

"Forget it," your publisher advises. "Get unequivocal, written permission. Otherwise do not quote the letter. Do not closely paraphrase it. Be careful about even photocopying it to show other scholars or your students. Let's not get sued."

What is your publisher talking about?

Your publisher, in that hypothetical scenario, is talking about a series of court opinions that some scholars and publishers charge are making it dangerous to rely on the doctrine of fair use for anything. Last year, the Organization of American Historians joined seven other national organizations of scholars, authors, and publishers in support of an appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court to overturn those opinions. Last February, without comment, the court refused to respond, thus letting the restrictive opinions stand.

Subsequently, Robert Kastenmeier (D-WI), in the House, and Paul Simon (D-IL), in the Senate, have introduced legislation to amend the copyright law. [See "Capitol Commentary," OAH Newsletter, May 1990.] Their bill is intended to make clear the intent of Congress that fair use may be made of copyrighted work "whether published or unpublished." They have been listening to scholars recount actual experiences not unlike the one above. In The Chronicle of Higher Education (April 18, 1990), political scientist David J. Garrow goaded scholars to write their Congressional representatives in support of the bill. But historian Michael Les Benedict, who also has been prominent in sounding the alarm, does not believe that even the proposed legislation is enough to stop what he calls the "erosion" of fair-use principles by the courts.

Scholarly publishers seem little alarmed—even little aware—of potential danger. Certainly they are not panicking.

What exactly have the courts decreed?

In a lead article in Perspectives (April, 1990), Benedict asserted that scholars won new protection from the Copyright Revision Act of 1976. It provides, among other things, that fair use may be made of unpublished as well as published materials. In 1985, however, in the case of Harper & Row v. National Enterprises, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that under "ordinary circumstances, the author's right to control the first public appearance of his undisseminated expression will outweigh a claim of fair use." Two years later, in Salinger v. Random House, the federal Second Circuit Court of Appeals, in New York, set forth specific prohibitions. The use of direct quotes from unpublished material to make a biography more vivid or readable would not be fair use. Neither would close paraphrasing. In 1987, a federal court ruled in Craft v. Kobler that, without permission, even published material could not be quoted for just stylistic purposes.

In 1988, in New Era v. Henry Holt & Co., a district judge said an author could quote without permission from unpublished, as well as published, sources to prove points about character. But on appeal, the Second Circuit seemed to overrule even that. It declared that "fair use is never to be liberally applied to unpublished copyrighted material," which "normally enjoy[s] complete protection," and warned that violators could be stopped from publishing even if their fair-use infractions were few. The U.S. Supreme Court let that decision, too, stand without comment, making it currently the law on fair use.

Results of these decisions include the following: Publication by Holt of Russell Millar's sharply critical biography of L. Ron Hubbard, founder of the Church of Scientology, would have been stopped except for a court finding that an injunction had not been sought early enough. Ian Hamilton had to revise substantially his Random House biography of fiction writer J. D. Salinger to reduce use of unpublished letters from Salinger to others. The courts' critics, including Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., as well as Professors Benedict and Garrow, have cited a dozen additional instances in which suits have been filed or threatened, or fair-use worries have led publishers to shy away from books, or authors have amended them significantly.

Prominent among pending cases is that of Victor Kramer of Georgia State University. Fair use is one of five grounds asserted by Professor Kramer in his suit against the estate of author and film critic James Agee, whose trustee denied permission to use material Agee says will illustrate a study of Agee's literary development. (The same trustee is disputing ownership of some Agee materials now held in the University of Tennessee's library.) But the case is unlikely to counter the trend of recent court decisions. Even if it

American Masterwork Remains in Fort Worth

A controversy covered nationally by art journals and mainstream media alike has ended happily for two neighboring museums in Fort Worth. The Amon Carter Museum has announced that it has purchased "The Swimming Hole" by Thomas Eakins from the Modern Art Museum of Fort Worth. The painting became the focus of controversy when the Modern decided to sell the 19th-century masterpiece at auction in order to raise money to buy modern art.

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram's news reports of the impending sale prompted a public outcry that eventually resulted in the withdrawal of the painting from auction consignment. Armed with public support, the Carter began scrambling for the funds to acquire the painting for its own permanent collection. Nine million of the $10 million purchase price has been covered by substantial pledges from Fort Worth foundations and the Carter's plans to sell selected works from its collection.

To help the Carter raise the final $1 million, the Fort Worth Star-Telegram agreed to lead a grassroots fund-raising campaign, and kicked it off by making the first donation—$100,000.

"The Swimming Hole" came to Fort Worth in 1925, when the artist's widow sold it to the Fort Worth Art Association, the governing body of the Modern Art Museum, for the then-considerable sum of $700. That money came from a fund built with contributions from local businessmen.

Testimony on Paper Preservation

Don W. Wilson, Archivist of the United States, has testified to Congress about paper preservation and the damaging effects of acidic paper on the nation's documentary heritage. He expressed his support for House Joint Resolution 226 which would require the use of acid-free paper for permanently valuable Federal records and publications.

Speaking before the Subcommittee on Government Information, Justice, and Agriculture of the House Committee on Government Operations, he discussed the fragility of certain records relating to World War II as an example of the consequences of record-keeping on paper which is not permanent. He emphasized the importance of developing standards for acid-free permanent paper with the cooperation of interested organizations, including industry and users. When these standards have been agreed upon, they should form the basis for specifications set by the Joint Committee on Printing and the General Services Administration for paper procurement, he said.

John J. McCloy Papers on Deposit

The personal and public papers of the late John J. McCloy, a key figure in U.S. statecraft for nearly half a century, are now deposited in the Robert Frost Library at Amherst College, on the campus where McCloy was a student and also served for many years as chairman of the board of trustees.

The papers cover McCloy's career of more than 70 years in private and public service. He died in March 1989 at the age of 93.

When the papers are completely organized, the letters, diaries, and other papers will fill more than 100 linear feet. Much of the collection has already been carefully organized and opened to research.

Daria D'Arienzo, the college's archivist, reports that McCloy first told the library in February 1985 that he was going to leave his papers to Amherst. The deed of gift for 54 linear feet was signed five months later. Most of the material then had to go through a long security review process at the State Department where, D'Arienzo says, papers amounting to perhaps one box full were either removed or deletions had to be made.

USSR Releases Goldman Papers to Berkeley

The Archivist of the United States has announced the release of copies of documents by the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the USSR relating to American anarchists Emma Goldman and Alexander Berkman. The material was released to the Emma Goldman Papers, a project sponsored by the National Archives' National Historical Publications and Records Commission, the University of California at Berkeley, the NEH, and others.

The documents include a record of the meeting between V.I. Lenin and Emma Goldman in March of 1920 at which she and her companion Alexander Berkman discussed their concerns about suppression of dissent in the Soviet Union. She wrote later that Lenin replied that "Free speech is a bourgeois prejudice, a soothing plaster for social ills."

Archivist Don W. Wilson called the release "a marvelous occurrence" and noted that one of the documents also contains Lenin's handwritten notes.

The documents came from both the Central Party Archives of the Institute of Marxism-Leninism in the Central Communist Party Committee and from the Central State Archives of the October Revolution. They will be included in the forthcoming microfilm and letterpress editions of the Emma Goldman Papers to be published by the University of California.

Foreign Relations Series and Declassification Policy.

On June 7 the Senate Foreign Relations Committee addressed some of the problems of access to historical documentation in their mark-up of the supplemental authorization of appropriations for FY'91 for the Department of State. Section 114, "The Foreign Relations of the United States' Historical Series," of S.2749 responds specifically to many of the difficulties that Warren Cohen, the Chairman of the U.S. Department of State Advisory Committee on Historical Diplomatic Documentation, cited in his February letter of resignation.

This section to legislate a principle of automatic declassification. S.2749 would give considerable review with very few exceptions, that 'all Department records will be available thirty years prior to the floor vote. A broad range of members have expressed their intention to offer amendments. Representative Pat Williams (D-MT), who chairs the Subcommittee with responsibility for the reauthorization of NEH, has noted that efforts will be taken to restrain the time allocated to the debate over the amendments. In the Senate the ranking members of the Subcommittee and the full Committee—Senators Kennedy (D-MA), Hatch (R-UT), Pell (D-RI), and Kassebaum (R-KS)—have been working hard for several weeks to reach a compromise on S.2724. Thus the leadership of the Senate Labor and Resources Committee hopes that by reaching agreement within the committee a major floor battle may be avoided.

National Endowment for the Humanities

Despite the whirl of controversy surrounding the reauthorization of the National Endowment for the Arts (NEA), there has been no criticism of NEH. However, since NEA, NEH, and the Institute of Museum Services are reauthorized by the same piece of legislation, it is possible that restrictive language designed specifically for the arts may also apply to the humanities. On June 19 the House Committee on Education and the Workforce held a hearing to consider H.R.4263 and S.1770 legislation that would move the New England Regional Archives from Waltham, Massachusetts, to Pittsfield, Massachusetts. This would involve moving the Regional Archives from Joseph Kennedy's (D-MA) district to that of Silvio Conte (R-MA), the ranking Republican on the House Appropriations Committee whose district includes Pittsfield. The concern of historians and archivists is that Pittsfield, located on the western border of the state, is not as accessible to researchers as the current location in the greater Boston area. Furthermore, the moving expenses would drain the already scarce resources of the National Archives and the separation of the Regional Archives from the Records Center would complicate the administration of both facilities. The New England Regional Archives is one of eleven branches of the National Archives which provides a full range of archival services to the public. These repositories house records that relate to the local and regional history of a particular area and include district court and court of appeal records. The New England Regional Archives has, for example, records of the U.S. Customs Service from 1789 to 1966 as well as the 1940-to-1946 records of the Office of Scientific Research and Development. The recommendations will be taken through many more hurdles in the House and Senate before they will become law.

Copyright Law on "Fair Use" of Unpublished Material

On July 11 the House and Senate will hold a joint hearing to consider H.R.4263 and S.2370 legislation to amend the copyright law to clarify that the principle of fair use established for published copyrighted works also applies to unpublished copyrighted materials. The need for legislation has been stimulated by the recent decision of the second U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New York which stated that unpublished primary source materials "normally enjoy complete protection" from any fair-use quotations and that the "copying of more than minimal amounts" of unpublished expressive materials calls for an "injunction" forbidding publication. Although Representative Robert Kastenmeier (D-WI) and Paul Simon (D-IL) introduced legislation in March, technical concerns expressed by the computer industry held up plans for the joint Congressional hearing. Congressional staff members have been working to iron out these difficulties.

National Historical Publication and Records Commission

In July Don Wilson, the U.S. Archivist, announced the appointment of Gerald George as the next Executive Director of the National Historical Publications and Records Commission. George, who from 1980 to 1987 was the Director of the American Association for State and Local History, will assume his duties in January, 1991. This announcement ended a two-year search which began in the summer of 1988 when Frank Ford, who served as Executive Director of NHPRC for thirteen years, announced his plans to leave for a new position at the University of Maryland. For most of the intervening period Richard Jacobs has served as the Interim Executive Director.

Paperwork Reduction Act

On June 7 the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee marked-up S.1742, reauthorization for the Paperwork Reduction Act. Major differences—regulatory and not information policy issues—still exist between the Senate bill and H.R. 3695, which was marked-up on March 13. Provisions to increase the authority of the U.S. Archivist appear in both bills. Following mark-ups, reports are prepared and, in most cases, must be filed three days prior to floor votes. Thus far neither House nor Senate reports have been filed. The Senate Subcommittee on Government Information and Regulation of the Governmental Affairs Committee, which has taken the lead on this legislation in the Senate, has been in the midst of some reorganization. Herbert Kohl (D-WI) recently placed Jeff Bingaman (D-NM) as chair of that subcommittee and former Representative Daniel Akaka (D-HI), Matsunaga's replacement, joined the subcommittee taking the empty seat created by Bingaman's departure.

State Department Bulletin

Last December, without notice, the State Department ceased publication of its Bulletin, which has been indexed in Readers' Guide and provides timely sources for such material as statements by the Secretary of State and list of current actions on treaties. The State Department argued that the Bulletin was "duplicative" of material that appeared elsewhere and that considerable resources could be saved by eliminating the publication. The Senate Supplemental Foreign Relations Authorization legislation, S.2749, includes a provision initiated by Senator Pell (D-RI), the Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, which calls for the resumption of publication of the Department of State Bulletin. The Foreign Relations Committee report on this legislation noted that the publication is a valuable resource for libraries, scholars, students and the general public because it contains the official record of U.S. foreign policy and contains major addresses, news conferences, Congressional testimony, press releases, treaties and other international agreements.
In June 1989, five authors and two editors of the Nearby History Series gathered for their first brainstorming session in South Bend, Indiana. The occasion was the Nearby History Symposium sponsored by the Northern Indiana Historical Society and the Indiana Humanities Council.

David E. Kyvig, series editor, and Myron A. Marty, consulting editor, are co-authors of the centerpiece publication under discussion at the symposium, Nearby History: Exploring the Past around You (1982). Kyvig and Marty have rejected the limitations of such terms as local, family or community history; rather they have chosen the term "nearby history" in order to include all features of a person's immediate environment. They expand the meaning of "nearby history" to "distinguish the new approaches which emphasize nonanalytical historical undertakings of past generations."

In the Nearby History Series, specialists in the field provide tools and guidance so that research and analysis by local investigators might be enhanced. They also attempt to bridge the gulf among various practitioners of history. The Nearby History Symposium carried forward these goals:

- to understand better the cultural heritage of communities;
- to increase awareness of the immediate environment and its history;
- to provide teaching ideas and methods for using local history resources in classrooms, museums, universities and communities; and
- to provide a context and develop a foundation for understanding local history and its role in the larger world.

The format of the symposium encouraged several types of communication and interaction: lecture, workshop and informal occasions for interchange among participants. Kyvig opened the proceedings with a keynote address that traced the changing perceptions of history in the United States and expressed his optimism for the future of the discipline.

The presentations by the Nearby History Series authors were structured in concurrent sessions. On the first day each author presented a general lecture on his specific topic; on the second day each conducted a workshop that focused on more specific techniques or topics that had evolved in his work. The subtitle of each book in the series is Exploring Their History, and the volumes are manuals, in part, on how to conduct quality research in specific subject areas. They also provide exciting and compelling perspectives on the role and function of these areas in society.

A panel session provided a formal exchange between the authors and the audience during which the authors candidly expressed what they had learned.

Emory L. Kemp of West Virginia University represented the team that wrote Houses and Homes and demonstrated how the particular evidence from a house could lead to broader discussions of the house as home, its people, their society, and the social issues that affected their lives. Gerald A. Danzer of the University of Illinois at Chicago and author of Public Places described how public places have shaped communities and demonstrated the rich evidence to be gleaned from maps which serve as visual connections of space over time. Ronald E. Butchart of SUNY College at Cortland and author of Local Schools lamented the lack of understanding and vision about the role of education in society and called for a new civic dialogue about the means and ends of education based on historical knowledge. Through the use of photographs of schools and events, Butchart demonstrated the reflection of changes in social ideas and in the vision of education through iconography, architecture, and design. Mansel Blackford of Ohio State University and co-author of Local Businesses demonstrated through his own work how careful research into local businesses can expand the understanding of the economic and social experience of that locale as well as benefit the individual businesses. James P. Wind of the Park Ridge Center in Illinois and author of Places of Worship demonstrated how the nearby history approach can be an exercise in corrective vision regarding the significant role of the congregational experience in society.

A panel session provided a formal exchange between the authors and the audience during which the authors candidly expressed what they had learned.

Myron Marty brought the symposium to its conclusion with a compelling presentation titled "Fitting the Pieces Together." Constructing a chart as he proceeded, Marty discussed the process of historical research and provided a framework for elements of the collective memory used in researching the past. The presentation moved the symposium full circle to summarize the thesis of Kyvig and Marty in Nearby History and the debate that these themes had generated among participants at the symposium.

Other Indiana educational and cultural organizations cooperating in the conference included the Association of Indiana Museums, the Cornelius O'Brien Lecture Series, Historic Landmarks Foundation of Indiana, the Indiana Historical Bureau, the Indiana Historical Society, and the Saint Joseph County Museum Association. The Indiana Humanities Council exercised a leadership role in bringing together these organizations whose work supports the study of nearby history from grade school to the university and beyond. The Council has demonstrated through the

History Teaching Alliance Receives Grant

The National Endowment for the Humanities (NEH) recently awarded the History Teaching Alliance one of only forty-one Challenge Grants awarded nationally. The History Teaching Alliance works to improve history education and develop networks between university and precollege teachers to organize collaborative, content-based history seminars across the country.

The HTA is a joint program of the American Historical Association, the Organization of American Historians, and the National Council for the Social Studies. The Department of History and the College of Liberal Arts of the University of Florida have hosted the national office of the HTA since 1987 and they provide substantial resources and support for its programs.

The NEH Challenge Grant of $225,000 requires the HTA to raise $675,000 from non-federal donors over the next four years. The goal of the HTA is to continue to build its network of teaching collaborators and expand to areas never before served.

In order to address these needs and meet the NEH challenge, the HTA has initiated a three-tier fundraising campaign. The HTA encourages contributions of any amount. All gifts must be marked, "In support of National Endowment for the Humanities Challenge Grant proposal #CX-20067-90."

For further information contact Jane Landers, Director, HTA, Department of History, 4131 Turlington Hall, University of Florida, Gainesville, FL 32611.

Illegal Sales of Alabama Records

The Alabama Department of Archives and History has recently learned that certain manuscript dealers in the Northeast have been dealing in early 19th-century court records from Lawrence County, Alabama.

The Department's records show that in the spring of 1971, a large quantity of public records were illegally removed from the Lawrence County Courthouse in Moulton, Alabama. Many of those records were subsequently purchased by private individuals and manuscript dealers who were unaware that they had been removed without the knowledge, consent or authorization of the county probate judge.

During the 1970s the Department recovered, with the assistance of the Alabama Attorney General's Office, a large portion of the Lawrence County records by notifying those parties holding them of their illegal removal. Many of the people who had acquired these documents voluntarily returned the records to the Alabama Department of Archives and History.

Based on examination of photocopies of documents which have recently appeared on the market, the Department believes them to be a portion of the records illegally removed from the Lawrence County Courthouse. The Department has received cooperation from Bookline Alert: Missing Books and Manuscripts (BAMBS) and the Alabama Bureau of Investigations.

Anyone with questions about possible missing Lawrence County records may contact the Alabama Department of Archives and History at 624 Washington Avenue, Montgomery, AL 36130.

ics, and social events. In many ways, Phi Beta Kappa offered symbolic reassurance to the faculty community and to many students of the worth of a higher education. By recalling the great men of the Republic who had been members of the Society (John Marshall, Daniel Webster), current members reaffirmed that fact that affirmed their own importance.

Throughout its history, Phi Beta Kappa had to defend itself from attacks regarding its alleged elitism. While it was still a secret literary society, some students denounced the organization for sowing division within the college community and several instances are recorded when opponents even stole the Society's records in order to learn its secrets. Elsewhere some feared that Phi Beta Kappa used secrecy to cloak a conspiracy against the Republic. In the 1790s, for example, some Federalists claimed that Phi Beta Kappa was seeking to foment revolution and asserted that the Society had been imported to these shores from Europe. In the 1830s, the Anti-Masonic movement linked Phi Beta Kappa to what they believed was a larger conspiracy by the Masons and other secret societies to rule the nation. To dispel any such fears, the Harvard chapter (at the urging of John Quincy Adams) ended all requirements of secrecy on the part of its members. More recently the Society has been criticized for an alleged reluctance to create new chapters at Catholic or predominantly black colleges.

Despite these and other controversies, Phi Beta Kappa survived. In part, this success stemmed from the Society's ability to broaden its membership to include non-academic elites. At the same time, it altered its definition of what constituted an educated person, moving away from the eighteen century's emphasis upon the classics and recognizing instead students who had distinguished themselves in the liberal arts and sciences.

In some ways, Phi Beta Kappa's survival remains exceptional. Scores of rituals and traditions have perished at the nation's colleges and universities. Secularization led to the eventual demise of mandatory chapel at many institutions in this century. Greater student freedom in the 1960s dealt a final blow to the long tradition that obliged freshmen to wear "beanies" and other forms of dress to distinguish them from upperclassmen.

Moffatt's study also argues that in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, the faculty and college officials sought to exercise greater control over student life. More students were persuaded to live in dormitories, and efforts were made to tighten control over the once independent fraternities. This pattern, continues Moffatt, led to an eventual decline in student rituals.

To a certain extent, increased faculty and alumni involvement in the affairs of Phi Beta Kappa in the early 1800s likewise served to diminish student interest in the organization. At the same time, however, it was the faculty and alumni who provided the leadership that would revive the Society in the latter part of the century. Despite their secondary status, students (except for a brief period in the 1960s) gladly accepted membership in some cases went to great lengths to obtain it.

Richard Current describes the continuing influence of ritual and tradition in contemporary higher education. His insights about the Society's past and Moffatt's observations about Rutgers suggest that there is a level of meaning to rituals in our annual commencement ceremonies that exceeds what even the most grizzled veteran of such occasions might have expected.

G. Kurt Piehler is an assistant editor with the Albert Gallatin Papers project. A recent Ph.D. graduate from Rutgers, he is the author of "Phi Beta Kappa: The Invention of an Academic Tradition," History of Education Quarterly (1988).

The Fight over "Fair Use"

It is not decided on other issues, it will be heard in the same federal circuit (southern New York), where the earlier cases were decided. Kramer's lawyer, Kristen Lundergan, is not aware—unfortunately, she says—of any fair-use cases pending in any other circuit.

In the meantime, scholarly publishers seem little alarmed—little aware of potential danger. Certainly they are not getting too nervous, to start censoring themselves. From the line of the publisher who has previouss written the article, "the fight over fair use is a tempest in an inkwell. "People are suckers for stories about their own business," he observes, and this may be just another case of journalism and other writers over-reacting to controversies that concern them directly. But he is just as alarmed as "doorknobs manufacturers." Dobel doesn't expect problems at Heritage, which he says tends to deal with long-deceased historical figures; "We haven't really had any problem, and haven't been sued. . . . Teddy Roosevelt is not about to descend on me."

Commercial presses, however, where big money as well as reputations may be at stake, are more concerned. Fearing that publicity might put lawsuit ideas into someone's head, editors there refuse to cite specific recent examples of putting pressure on authors to get permissions to quote or of delaying publication for want of them. "I am not aware of anybody I deal with being frightened off by these [fair-use] cases," says James Maire, a vice president of W. W. Norton and Company. But he acknowledges that publishers may become more shy if only to avoid increased likelihood of nuisance suits. Senior Editor Ashbel Green of Alfred A. Knopf, Inc., is more reticent. "We continue to raise the case. We are asking authors for permissions more carefully now." Another New York publisher who declined to be identified described plans to go ahead with a biography of a controversial figure despite some possible fair-use exposure: "We're taking a lot of risks."

Why, in the view of such a concerned person as Professor Benedict, will the newly proposed legislation not end the researcher and unauthorized use? To address this question, the editor of the Journal of American History asks, "What does this solution be the Supreme Court already has agreed that fair use applies to unpublished as well as published documents. The new legislation does not say that it applies "equally" to both kinds. Professor Benedict himself is among those who are not at all sure that published and unpublished material should be treated exactly alike, which could raise financial and privacy issues. In Benediect's view, the solution would be more liberal judicial interpretation. "The whole doctrine of fair use was developed by the courts . . . the real problem is that the courts have defined it unrealistically."

Effects on scholarship will continue to unfold, he predicts, and obstacles to the use of documents increase. "It is a question of when, not if, owners will copyright unpublished manuscripts." Some other scholars and publishers will not react in fearful self-censorship. "I hope they will go on waiting" to see what happens—"there isn't any reason yet to do anything else."

The Chicago Historical Society and the Atlanta Historical Society have successfully made the transition. The Pierpont Morgan Library and the Folger Library are now placing more emphasis on exhibits and public programming. The Virginia Historical Society, the decision to go beyond the traditional mode of library and learned society was made several years ago and after intensive study by board and staff. It was an attempt to redress the absence of a state history museum and of an organization providing educational assistance to teachers. We launched these initiatives from a position of fiscal strength and with a definite financial plan.

Indeed, historical societies must operate prudently and not overextend themselves in trying to be "all things to all people." To leave the impression that the opening up of historical societies has only led to trouble is an unfortunate distortion and slight the accomplishments of many institutions that are successfully meeting the challenges of American history today. Author Gerald George responds:

I can appreciate the desire of my critics to distance their state historical societies from the troubled ones I described in the article, and I am all too familiar with the refrain often heard: "only the Missouri Historical Society is a state historical society. (It is, of course, is among those who are personal familiar enough with the institutions they, themselves, lead to applaud the success all three seem to be having—in the different courses they are pursuing."

But let me help my critics. I am personally familiar enough with the institutions they, themselves, lead to applaud the success all three seem to be having—in the different courses they are pursuing."

An Agenda for Academic Historians

From Gray Page 8

For the tenured, I would reply that in my experience, in recent years colleges and universities have begun to take a more holistic view of a faculty member's responsibility, to see each aspect of the holy trinity of teaching, research, and service as important and, indeed, interrelated, and to promote and grant tenure on the basis of excellence in areas other than just research. Of course, we need to continue to develop research skills and utilize new and better theoretical and analytical approaches, and to communicate our findings both to students and colleagues, but also, I would add, to others. You will find an interested and intelligent audience out there, and be able to assist in opening up the American mind, advancing cultural literacy, and exposing the falsehoods of Prof-scam. Probably, too, you will begin to get additional responses to your pronouncements and publications.■

"Nearby History"

Nearby History Symposium how effectively state councils can work to facilitate dialogue among cultural and educational organizations on matters of mutual institutional interest crucial to an informed and engaged citizenry. In Humanities and the American Promise (1987), state councils were commended for giving "shape to a curriculum in the humanities that differ markedly from the formal curricula of schools, colleges, and universities, yet treats the same fundamen-tal questions of the quality of life and provokes public discourse about them." The councils are—and must con-tinue to be— an integral part of the con-cet of lifelong learning, working with other cultural institutions to provide the means and opportunity for high quality educational experiences for the adult public and for teachers who must help to instill that love of learning in the students that they teach. The Nearby History Symposium offered a model for productive interchange between academia and the public and for partnerships to encourage and enhance such interactions.■
