Civil Rights in America: Racial Desegregation in Public Accommodations

A National Historic Landmark Theme Study
United States Department of the Interior
National Park Service

National Register of Historic Places
Multiple Property Documentation Form

This form is used for documenting multiple property groups relating to one or several historic contexts. See instructions in How to Complete the Multiple Property Documentation Form (National Register Bulletin 16B). Complete each item by entering the requested information. For additional space, use continuation sheets (Form 10-900-a). Use a typewriter, word processor, or computer to complete all items.

__X__ New Submission ____ Amended Submission

A. Name of Multiple Property Listing

CIVIL RIGHTS IN AMERICA THEME STUDY: RACIAL DESEGREGATION OF PUBLIC ACCOMMODATIONS

B. Associated Historic Contexts

(Name each associated historic context, identifying theme, geographical area, and chronological period for each.)

C. Form Prepared by name/title Matt Garcia, Alton Hornsby, Jr., and Steven Lawson/Historians; Susan Cianci Salvatore/Preservation Planner organization National Park Service, National Register, History and Education, National Historic Landmarks Survey; National Conference of State Historic Preservation Officers; and Organization of American Historians street & number 1849 C Street, NW (2280)

Date February 17, 2004

Telephone 202-354-2210

city or town Washington state DC zip code 20240

D. Certification

As the designated authority under the National Historic Preservation Act of 1966, as amended, I hereby certify that this documentation form meets the National Register documentation standards and sets forth requirements for the listing of related properties consistent with the National Register criteria. This submission meets the procedural and professional requirements set forth in 36 CFR Part 60 and the Secretary of the Interior's Standards and Guidelines for Archeology and Historic Preservation. (See continuation sheet for additional comments.)

Signature and title of certifying official

Date

State or Federal agency and bureau

I hereby certify that this multiple property documentation form has been approved by the National Register as a basis for evaluating related properties for listing in the National Register.

Signature of the Keeper

Date
Table of Contents for Written Narrative

Provide the following information on continuation sheets. Cite the letter and the title before each section of the narrative. Assign page numbers according to the instructions for continuation sheets in How to Complete the Multiple Property Documentation Form (National Register Bulletin 16B). Fill in page numbers for each section in the space below.

Page Numbers

E. Statement of Historic Contexts
(If more than one historic context is documented, present them in sequential order.)
INTRODUCTION.................................................................2

PART ONE, 1775-1900 .................................................................5
    Colonial Era to the Civil War..................................................6
    Reconstruction to the Age of Jim Crow..................................9
    Segregation of Latina/os in the 19th Century..........................20

PART TWO, 1900-1941 .................................................................25
    The Age of Jim Crow to World War II....................................26
    Segregation of Latina/os in the 20th Century..........................35

PART THREE, 1941-1954.................................................................41
    Birth of the Civil Rights Movement.......................................42
    Latina/os Movements for Desegregation of Public Accommodations....................................................52

PART FOUR, 1954-1964.................................................................64
    Modern Civil Rights Movement............................................65
    Civil Rights Legislation.......................................................92

F. Associated Property Types
(Provide description, significance, and registration requirements.)
Property Types .................................................................104
Registration Requirements ..................................................104

G. Geographical Data .................................................................111

H. Summary of Identification and Evaluation Methods
(Discuss the methods used in developing the multiple property listing.)
Methodology.................................................................112
Survey Results.................................................................114

I. Major Bibliographical References
(List major written works and primary location of additional documentation: State Historic Preservation Office, other State agency, Federal agency, local government, university, or other, specifying repository.)

Appendix A. National Register of Historic Places Criteria.................................................................143
Appendix B. Chronological List of Selected Local/National Movements.............................................147
Appendix C. Chronology of the May 1961 Freedom Ride: Alabama & Mississippi..........................................150
Appendix D. Civil Rights Acts, Interstate Commerce Commission Rulings, & U.S. Supreme Court Rulings..152

Paperwork Reduction Act Statement: This information is being collected for applications to the National Register of Historic Places to nominate properties for listing or determine eligibility for listing, to list properties, and to amend existing listings. Response to this request is required to obtain a benefit in accordance with the National Historic Preservation Act, as amended (16 U.S.C. 470 et seq.). Estimated Burden Statement: Public reporting burden for this form is estimated to average 120 hours per response including the time for reviewing instructions, gathering and maintaining data, and completing and reviewing the form. Direct comments regarding this burden estimate or any aspect of this form to the Chief, Administrative Services Division, National Park Service, P.O. Box 37127,
Washington, DC 20013-7127; and the Office of Management and Budget, Paperwork Reductions Project (1024-0018), Washington, DC 20503.
STATEMENT OF HISTORIC CONTEXTS

Marion Anderson performing at the Lincoln Memorial, Washington, D.C. on April 9, 1939. (Marian Anderson Collection, Rare Book & Manuscript Library, University of Pennsylvania.)
E. STATEMENT OF HISTORIC CONTEXT

INTRODUCTION

In 1999 the U.S. Congress authorized the National Park Service to conduct a multi-state study of civil rights sites to determine the appropriateness of including these sites in the National Park System. To determine how best to proceed, the National Park Service partnered with the Organization of American Historians to compile an overview of civil rights history as a framework for identifying sites. Overall, it was determined that while a number of civil rights sites had been identified and interpreted, there were still many sites that remained to be identified and evaluated. Taking this into account, the framework recommended that a National Historic Landmarks theme study be prepared to identify sites that may be nationally significant, and that the study be based on provisions of the 1960s civil rights acts. These include the Civil Rights Act of 1964 (covering voting rights, equal employment, public accommodations, and school desegregation enforcement), the Voting Rights Act of 1965, and the Fair Housing Act of 1968. This specific portion of the study focuses on the aspect of public accommodations.¹

Inclusion in the National Park System first requires that properties meet the National Historic Landmark criteria, and then meet additional tests of suitability and feasibility. To establish guidance on meeting landmark criteria, this study provides a historic context within which properties may be evaluated for their significance in civil rights and establishes registration requirements for National Historic Landmark consideration. Completion of this study will also assist in the identification of sites for National Historic Landmark designation and will help nominating authorities in states and federal agencies identify properties that should be nominated and listed in the National Register of Historic Places.

Public Accommodations Overview

The physical separation of the races in public accommodations was a resented and demeaning practice for those denied equal access. Segregation in theaters, restaurants, hotels, and buses was a constant irritant in everyday life and an insulting inconvenience. It resulted in direct confrontations between racial minorities claiming the right to pay for goods and services in the marketplace, and white business owners who claimed the right to serve who they chose. Overall, the civil rights movement forced federal intervention that destroyed the legal foundations of racism and transformed race relations in the South. The resulting 1964 Civil Rights Act “was a landmark in legislative attempts to improve the quality of life for African Americans and other minority groups.” Title II of the act “[o]utlawed discrimination in hotels, motels, restaurants, theaters, and all other public accommodations engaged in interstate commerce.”²

A thorough study of desegregation of public accommodations requires an initial understanding of how racial segregation has operated in the United States. Segregation did not occur uniformly throughout the United States, and the form and content of this practice changed over time. Variations in this practice had much to do with the places in which they occurred and the groups involved. This study’s emphasis on “racial” segregation and desegregation suggests, however, that the denial of equal access to public accommodations to a group or groups had much to do with the common experience of being labeled nonwhite, and therefore not worthy of equal access on racial grounds. What made each group nonwhite differed from place to place, but the fact that these beliefs applied to various groups in different locations throughout the nation over several years is a testament to the ways in which race has shaped our society. State laws, local ordinances, and customs that segregated whites and blacks were also applied to other minorities. To represent this aspect, this study expands beyond the African American story to include the experience of Latinos. Within this context, Mexicans represent the best example for the study of Latinos since their experiences with segregation have been plentiful and their history is rich with examples.

¹ In the area of school desegregation, the National Park Service partnered with the Organization of American Historians to complete a National Historic Landmarks Theme Study entitled, “Racial Desegregation in Public Education in the United States,” (2000). Other topics to be covered in future chapters of the civil rights story include housing, equal employment, and voting.
² Quoted material from www.congresslink.org/civil/essay.html.

Of special note in documenting the Latino experience in discrimination is the level of documentation available in the area of public accommodation segregation and desegregation as compared to other areas of discrimination. The most documented cases of systematic segregation and desegregation have occurred in the realm of education since public schools were the sites of the most organized attempts to separate groups along racial lines. The fight to dismantle school segregation involved numerous court cases such as Mendez v. Westminster (1946) and Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka (1954) that produced richly documented sources for historians to piece together. Similarly, historians of segregation and desegregation in housing have benefited from rich archival sources such as restrictive clauses in new housing contracts and the records of the Federal Housing Administration. Court cases such as Shelley v. Kraemer (1948) figured prominently in the struggle to end the practice of residential segregation that left behind valuable evidence of desegregation.

The systematic and legal nature of both educational and housing discrimination has made the writing of this history possible.

In documenting Latino experiences of segregation in public accommodations, many Chicano/Latino historians have relied on oral history and material evidence (such as photos of signs reading “White-trade Only” on places of business) as well as court cases and legislative acts to compile a record of this segregation. Struggles against such systems of discrimination have largely been documented in Spanish and bilingual community newspapers that reported mass movements against theaters, public pools, restaurants, and bars that denied equal service to Latino clientele. While these histories provide a fuller picture of the kind of racial exclusion experienced by Latino people, they have not been addressed in books and articles focused solely on segregation in public accommodations. Rather, these experiences have been embedded in more general discussions of discrimination and the civil rights movements. Unlike education and housing desegregation that emerged as a result of landmark court decisions, the end of segregation in public accommodations more often occurred in the wake of direct action such as picketing, boycotts, and media attention to the problem.

---

3 In the case of Mendez v. Westminster School District, 64 F. Supp. 544 (1946), 161 F.2d 744 (1947), the courts found segregation of Mexican students unlawful in California and a denial of the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. In Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954), the U.S. Supreme Court found public school segregation unconstitutional.

The National Park Service also gave consideration to inclusion of the Asian American and Native American experience in this study. Scholarly guidance indicated that this form of discrimination was not a prominent civil rights issue in their respective histories. The struggle for Asian Americans for equal treatment in terms of public accommodations was largely settled with the ending of their special status as aliens ineligible for citizenship in the era of 1943-1952. While there are individual examples of local denial of equal accommodations—such as in Seattle and Los Angeles—they did not leave a trail of case law. By the time most successful suits about equal accommodations were instituted, Asian Americans were not being denied them to any great degree. For Native Americans (including Alaska Natives and Native Hawaiians), the National Park Service study Civil Rights in America: A Framework for Identifying Significant Sites (draft, 2002) did not identify any events, persons, or places associated with access to public accommodations. It did, however, recognize that the Native American civil rights story is unique. Therefore, the study recommended that the National Park Service consult with Native Americans regarding the completion of a separate theme study for the history of Native American civil rights.5

Study Format

This document begins with a historic context of the segregation and desegregation of public accommodations that includes both places of business and public transportation. The context is divided into four chronological periods that intertwine the Latino and African American stories. Part One covers the colonial era and extends up to the age of Jim Crow. Part Two covers the age of Jim Crow to World War II. Part Three begins with the effects of World War II on discrimination and explores the subsequent various efforts for desegregation in the post war period up to 1954 and the U.S. Supreme Court’s decision in Brown v. Board of Education. Part Four is devoted to the modern civil rights movement leading up to the passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

The context is followed by a discussion of associated property types (such as parks and restaurants) that may illustrate key events, decisions, and persons associated with milestones or crucial turning points in the historical movement to desegregate public accommodations. Registration requirements then outline how properties may qualify for National Historic Landmark designation. The summary of identification and evaluation methods includes a description of the methodology used in the survey, and a list of currently designated and potential historic properties identified during the course of the study. A series of appendices conclude the study. Appendix A addresses the criteria for listing on the National Register of Historic Places at the state and local levels of significance. Appendix B contains a list of selected local and national movements. Appendix C describes the chronological development of the May 1961 Freedom Ride through Alabama and Mississippi. Lastly, Appendix D lists civil rights acts, Interstate Commerce rulings and U.S. Supreme Courts rulings associated with racial discrimination in public accommodations.

---

5 Serving as consulting historians on the Asian American and Native American stories were Dr. Roger Daniels, Charles Phelps Taft Professor of History, University of Cincinnati; and Dr. James Riding In, Associate Professor of Justice studies and American Indian Studies, Arizona State University, and citizen of the Pawnee Nation of Oklahoma.
PART ONE, 1775-1900

NEGRO EXPULSION FROM RAILWAY CAR, PHILADELPHIA.

COLONIAL ERA TO THE CIVIL WAR

Colonial Free Black Population

Equal access to public accommodations arose early in the history of the United States of America. It began in the colonial era and continued through the Civil War into the twentieth century. Since most persons of African descent in the North American colonies, and later the United States, were in bondage prior to the Civil War, the question of race and public accommodations was largely one which affected the class of blacks known as “free Negros.” The origins of this class were characterized by similar factors. Standing out foremost are emancipation or manumission by slave owners, purchase by free blacks or others, escape from slavery, and state action. Between 1775 and 1783, emancipation accelerated in some places during the “atmosphere of freedom” created by the American Revolution.

It is impossible to render an accurate estimate of this free black population before the first census of 1790. Even with the first and later censuses, the enumeration of this population was fraught with difficulties and obstacles. One difficulty was that much of the black population became “invisible” at census-taking time, as many blacks tended to fear census takers as “slave catchers.” Another difficulty was how black residences, located in dilapidated and dangerous parts of cities or isolated parts of rural areas, deterred census takers. Lastly, categories of African Americans based upon skin complexion or circumstance of birth complicated specific racial designation.

Beginning in the 19th century, growth in the free black population is attributed to the abolition of slavery in the North, the increase of manumissions in the Upper South, and the growing possibility for slaves to either purchase their freedom or run away in the South. By 1830, slavery in the North had been virtually abolished through constitutional, judicial, or legislative action and the free black population had increased substantially from 27,000 in 1790, to about 130,000 in 1830. In the Upper South the free black population rose from 30,000 in 1790, to about 150,000 in 1830. However, the story in the Lower South was quite different. In 1790 there were only about 2,000 free blacks. Even with adding Louisiana after 1803, the free black population in the Lower South was no higher than in the Upper South in 1790.

As this population grew, legal restrictions on their political and civil rights (especially in the cities) were quickly enacted and reflected the steady deterioration of the legal and social status of free blacks, making it difficult to distinguish between slaves and free blacks. Also, fear of slave insurrections, such as Nat Turner’s rebellion in 1831, had the effect of deterring further slave manumission and constricting the liberty of free blacks in the South. Some scholars have produced valuable studies on the effect of racism on the free black caste. Historian Winthrop Jordan observed

---

6 Part One of this study on African American history was authored by Dr. Alton Hornsby, Jr., Fuller E. Callaway Professor, Morehouse College and Susan C. Salvatore, Preservation Planner, National Park Service, National Historic Landmarks Survey.

that colonists denounced people they felt could potentially incite slave insurrections. Chief among those suspected were free Negroes who would side with those of their color rather than those of their legal status, and thus became feared and despised for their threat to white society. Historian Leon Litwack noted that the rights of citizenship were withheld from free Negroes and that until after the Civil War “most northern whites would maintain a careful distinction between granting Negroes legal protection—a theoretical right to life, liberty, and property—and political and social equality.” Even the social standing between freed white indentured servants and freed slaves differed. Lorenzo Greene, one of the first African American scholars to present a comprehensive study of New England blacks, observed that freed servants became respected members of the community, while freed slaves remained in a lower social status even if they had taken on their former masters’ culture.10

Antebellum Exclusion & Segregation

The northern colonies primarily tended to address issues of the right to public accommodations through local ordinances and customs. Up to the Civil War, the colonies, and later states, most often “reserved” public accommodations for whites only. Litwack summarizes the separate treatment of African Americans thusly:

They were either excluded from railway cars, omnibuses, stagecoaches, and steamboats or assigned to special “Jim Crow” sections; they sat, when permitted, in secluded and remote corners of theaters and lecture halls; they could not enter most hotels, restaurants, and resorts, except as servants; they prayed in “Negro pews” in the white churches . . . Moreover, they were often educated in segregated schools, punished in segregated prisons, nursed in segregated hospitals, and buried in segregated cemeteries.11

In 1804, Ohio took the lead in passing Black Laws that were designed to restrict the rights and freedom of movement of free blacks in the North that served as early precursors to “Jim Crow” ordinances and legislation. Blacks were barred from the militia and medical infirmaries, and even though they paid equal taxes on their property, their children were excluded from public schools.12

In Massachusetts, blacks sought an end to the state’s Jim Crow transportation practices. When the Boston and Providence Railroad opened its route to New York, the company’s president stated that “an appreciable number of the despised race demanded transportation. Scenes of riot and violence took place, and in the then existing state of opinion, it seemed to me that the difficulty could best be met by assigning a special car to our colored citizens.”13 Massachusetts newspapers in 1838 reported frequent incidents of Negroes refusing to sit in Jim Crow sections and being forcibly removed from the train. Negroes also sought relief through the legislature and white abolitionists encouraged boycotts. As a result, a joint legislative committee recommended a bill to halt discrimination.

Negative reaction followed. Fearing increased integration, one state senator declared that “such legislation would not stop at forcing the mixture of Negroes and whites in railroad cars, but would subsequently be applied to hotels, religious societies, ‘and through all ramifications of society.’” The act failed to pass.14

By 1841, intense efforts to end Jim Crow cars began. Black abolitionists like Frederick Douglass refused to move to the Jim Crow car and did so only after being physically removed from their seats.15 In 1842, the black abolitionist Charles Lenox Redmond went before a committee in the Massachusetts legislature to protest his segregation in a “special railway car for negroes.” Touching upon the right to equality and inherent inferiority without it, Redmond stated that “the wrongs inflicted and injuries received on railroads by person of color . . . do not end with the termination of the route, but in effect, tend to discourage, disparage, and depress this class of citizens.”16

Protests, changing public opinion, and threats of legislative action caused rail companies in Massachusetts to abandon segregation practices in 1843. Elsewhere in the North, by 1865, abolitionists and blacks used petitions, legislative lobbying, boycotts, and law suits to thwart northern segregated transportation. Although the practice continued on a limited basis, Jim Crow travel ceased as a major problem for northern blacks.17

For southern blacks, segregation was not always legally or rigidly enforced. However, Negroes generally could not enter hotels and restaurants, and in some locations faced discrimination in public conveyances. Overall, they were separated from whites in public buildings if accommodated at all. In Charleston, Richmond, and Savannah, blacks could enter public grounds and gardens only during certain hours or were restricted all together. At times separate institution building for blacks occurred (albeit for the economic advantage of white business owners). One such example was an “exclusive resort for free people of color” on Louisiana’s Lake Pontchatrain that was opened by a New Orleans railroad in the 1830s and which instituted “blacks only” cars to transport their patrons.18

A major opportunity for judicial interpretation of segregation presented itself when abolitionists and others brought a suit on behalf of a bondsman, Dred Scott. Between 1834 and 1838, Scott’s owners had taken him into the free territories of Illinois, Minnesota and Wisconsin. Scott sued for his freedom in the circuit court of St. Louis, Missouri, contending that he should be a free man under the provisions of the Missouri Compromise of 1820. Under the Court’s ruling in 1857, Scott was not and could not be a citizen of Missouri “within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States” and thus could not sue in its courts. Furthermore, the Court held that Congress had no authority to forbid slavery in the territories.19

19 Stanley I. Kutler, The Dred Scott Decision: Law or Politics (Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co., 1967), xvi-xix, 8-9; John Quasi-free blacks and their white allies reacted quickly and angrily to the Supreme Court’s decision, which placed their already fragile rights in further jeopardy. Indeed, the Dred Scott decision seemed to firmly institutionalize the inferior status of all blacks and to place them only at the sufferance of whites. While most vowed to do what they could “by all proper means,” greater despair overcame many; others plotted rebellion with their white allies. But plots and rebellions, even the sensational one by white abolitionist John Brown at Harpers Ferry, Virginia in 1859, were no match for a Slavocracy that was fully supported by the United States government. The inability of many in the North and West to accept the possibility of a nation dominated by Slavocracy proved to be the catalyst which would soon reopen the doors of “freedom” to quasi-free blacks and lead to the emancipation of African American bondspeople. The conflict between slave states and free states soon tore the nation asunder and into Civil War.

RECONSTRUCTION TO THE AGE OF JIM CROW

The Civil War brought major alterations in almost every aspect of American life. Foremost among these were the destruction of American Negro slavery and the granting of citizenship rights to freed and free blacks. Lincoln issued the Emancipation Proclamation on January 1, 1863, and he spoke of freedom and justice in the Gettysburg Address of 1863. After his assassination, blacks and fellow Republicans mourned “the Great Emancipator,” while the more ardent of the radical Republicans took heart in the ascension of his successor, the maverick Democrat Andrew Johnson of Tennessee. Johnson proved disheartening to black civil rights advances as southern provisional legislatures, established under Johnson’s presidency, adopted Black Codes to limit Negro civil rights.

From 1865-1867, southern whites worked to restrict admission of blacks to insane asylums, orphanages, poorhouses, and institutions for the deaf and dumb. In the area of transportation, between 1865 and 1866, Mississippi, Florida, and Texas either prohibited blacks from first class cars or required segregated cars. Florida did not racially discriminate in handing down a sentence for breaking its law. A misdemeanor penalty applied to either colored or white people who entered a car reserved for the opposite race. The accused faced either standing “in pillory for one hour,” or being whipped up to thirty-nine times, or both.

To enforce the end of slavery and ensure equal rights for freed blacks, the Republican Congress proposed the Civil Rights Act of 1866. The act declared that all persons born in the U.S. (except Indians) were citizens regardless of race, color, or previous condition of slavery or involuntary servitude. Under the act, blacks received rights they could enjoy as equally as whites, such as the ability to make and enforce contracts and to purchase and hold property. But, on March 27, 1866, President Andrew Johnson vetoed the landmark legislation on the grounds that it violated states’ rights. The Republican Congress was able to override Johnson’s veto. Continuing southern resistance prompted Congress to further action when, in March 1867, it approved the first Military Reconstruction Act halting Johnson’s reign over Reconstruction. The act separated the former Confederate states (except Tennessee) into five military districts to be overseen by Union generals.

The occupying federal troops and the Freedmen’s Bureau forced modifications of racial policies in many parts of the South. Historian Howard Rabinowitz describes this as an important shift from racial exclusion to racial segregation. For example, Alabama admitted blacks for the first time to its insane asylum on a segregated basis. Nashville’s street car company went from excluding blacks to providing them with a separate car. Separate or “special” sections of public cemeteries continued.23

Most southern Republicans did not force integration on opposing whites for various reasons. These included “their own racial prejudice, the need to attract white voters to the party, or the belief that legislated integration was unconstitutional or simply could not succeed.” Instead they supported replacing exclusion with segregation on an equal basis. Perhaps this “would appease blacks,” according to Rabinowitz, “and not frighten prospective white voters with the specter of miscegenation.”24

Nonetheless, exclusion persisted. In Montgomery, blacks had their own skating rink and picnicked at Lambert Springs and Cypress Pond whereas whites attended Oak Grove and Pickett Springs. In Nashville, blacks attended “colored fairgrounds.”25 Some recreational places went from equal access to segregation. In April 1871, New Orleans’ Metairie Racecourse forced black horse racing fans onto a separate stand and at the Louisiana Jockey Club in 1873, blacks were admitted to the Fair Grounds Course but excluded from the quarter stretch, “a stand at the finish line.” Previously allowed in any part of the French Opera House, blacks were restricted in the winter of 1874-1875, “allegedly in response to ‘the clamor of the White League and its foolish prejudices.”26

Streetcar Segregation

Streetcar exclusion and segregation became an increasingly contentious area of southern race relations that did not go unchallenged. Four blacks excluded from streetcars in Richmond, Virginia in April 1867, staged a sit-in on a streetcar. City officials claimed that the privately owned railway company could set its own regulations. Federal military authorities overruled the city officials stating that all paying passengers had a right to ride the streetcars. Nonetheless, the authorities did permit the use of segregated cars; an arrangement similar to those allowed by authorities in cities such as Charleston, Mobile, and Nashville.27

By 1867, blacks in New Orleans had declared war on streetcar segregation; a practice bitterly resented by Negroes “. . . for it caused them considerable inconvenience and afforded them a constant reminder of their inferior station in society.” New Orleans’ segregated cars, known as “star cars” because of a star painted on their sides, came to symbolize white supremacy. Whites often

---

23 Rabinowitz, “From Exclusion to Segregation,” 327. Work of the Freedmen’s Bureau included supervising affairs related to newly freed slaves in the southern states.
24 Ibid., 332. Rabinowitz also held that segregation was strengthened when blacks formed their own institutions after being excluded, 326, note 3.
25 Ibid., 331-332, see notes 38 and 39 for references to the Montgomery Alabama State Journal, the Nashville Republican Banner, and the Montgomery Advertiser.
crowded blacks out of these cars, thus excluding Negroes completely or forcing them to stand in the aisles. Then, on April 28, 1867, a black man was arrested for trying to force his way into a white streetcar. Although the breach of peace charges were subsequently dismissed, the defendant countersued the streetcar starter for assault and battery. Following this incident, blacks intensified their war against discrimination on the streetcars. Omnibus authorities responded with a policy of “passive resistance” promulgated to avoid violence or lawsuits. Henceforth, operators refused to proceed until the colored passengers left on their own.28

The situation climaxed one weekend in May 1867, as “a bellicose [sic] crowd of colored men and boys” gathered in the city and brought New Orleans on “the brink of race warfare.” The crowd “began harassing the passing white cars by shouting curses, blocking the street, and by showering the cars with a variety of projectiles.” Meanwhile, blacks attempted to board white cars, and in one case, white passengers drove them back. Violence broke out as armed blacks entered cars, overpowered white passengers, and threatened drivers. Roving fights between white and black gangs occurred throughout the city and an estimated 500 black protesters gathered in Congo Square on Rampart Street and overtook white streetcars.29

Rather than calling in federal forces to quell the disturbances, the mayor of New Orleans promised the protesters an immediate review of the streetcar segregation policies. Car company spokesmen asked the city to support the “star” system, but executives, taking into account business and property losses, resolved otherwise. Streetcar desegregation came about slowly and with limited turmoil. With dismay, the Daily Picayune, a white militant supremacist newspaper, prophesied that the action to desegregate the streetcars was “simply the introductory step to more radical innovations which must materially alter our whole social fabric.”30

Success at integrating streetcars also occurred in Louisville, Kentucky between 1870-1871. All three of that city’s streetcar companies had their own rules of segregation. Black women could ride on certain routes, while black men were either totally excluded or rode on a front platform with the driver. On October 30, 1870, the first planned “ride-in” occurred. A crowd of blacks numbering between 200–300 gathered in Quinn Chapel on Walnut Street. They chose three men to board a streetcar at the Central Passenger Railroad Company’s stop at Tenth and Walnut. After refusing to leave the streetcar, some of the drivers forced them out, whereupon other blacks “hurled hunks of hard mud at the car.” Efforts to re-board the car prompted further unrest, leading police to arrest the riders for disorderly conduct. The local court judge fined them $5.00 and refused to hear their attorneys’ arguments on the larger issue of racial equal rights. Black leaders then decided to pursue the case at the federal level.31

The riders finally won their case on May 11, 1871 in the U.S. District Court. But streetcar companies did not capitulate as blacks tested their right to ride over the next three days and drivers refused to move the cars. Eventually tensions erupted in front of the Willard Hotel as whites forcibly removed a black boy from a car and police had to break up the crowd. Although denouncing the 29 Ibid., 223-226, quoted material on 223, 224.

30 Ibid., 226-230, newspaper quote on 230. Streetcars were resegregated in 1902.
31 Majorie N. Norris, “An Early Instance of Nonviolence: The Louisville Demonstrations of 1870-71,” The Journal of Southern History 32, no. 4 (Nov., 1966), 491-494, quote on 492. The decision to go to the federal level was based on the fact that the state’s courts refused black testimony.
ride-ins, the city’s newspapers called for segregated cars. In a meeting with the mayor and railway officials, blacks refused to accept the offer of segregated cars, and facing economic and political issues, the companies agreed to integrate.32

Overall, between 1868 and 1873, seven southern states enacted civil rights laws to end segregated transportation. In South Carolina, one passenger traveling on a newly integrated river steamer in 1868 from Charleston to Beaufort described Negro passengers as being everywhere and, “choosing the best state rooms and best seats at the table.” Some cities outside the South witnessed success in legally challenging segregation. Between 1865 and 1873, cases in Philadelphia, San Francisco, and Chicago found segregation unlawful on certain conveyances. During the late nineteenth century mixed southern streetcar seating generally “remained the rule” only to be segregated again at the turn of the century.33

Legislative and Judicial Action: 1868-1883

There was enough concern about the constitutionality of the Civil Rights Act of 1866 to spur its supporters to incorporate major provisions into a proposed constitutional amendment. Northern neo-abolitionists agreed that such a push forward to secure black citizenship, as had been the case with black freedom, should be through a constitutional amendment. The establishment of citizenship and civil rights was proposed in the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution in 1866 and ratified by the states in 1868. Section 1 made all persons born within the country citizens of the U.S. and the states where they resided, and forbid the states to make or enforce any laws denying such persons the full rights and privileges of such citizenship. Political matters, white racism, and other considerations soon undercut the intended effects of the amendment. Aided by a “white backlash” bolstered by economic dominance, exploitation, and violence, the full thrust of the amendment was circumvented, violated, and ignored throughout the South and in many parts of the North.

In 1873, the U.S. Supreme Court made its first anti-segregation ruling in a railroad case when a black woman was forced to leave the car reserved for whites to ride in an equal car reserved for blacks. Congress had chartered the line in 1863 and required that no person “. . . be excluded from the cars on account of color.” Therefore, the Court interpreted the act as meaning that persons of color could ride in the same cars as whites, even when the cars were equal.34

In the same year, Delaware, passed a resolution supporting Massachusetts’s Senator Charles Sumner’s supplemental civil rights bill, then before the U.S. Senate, that would become the Civil Rights Act of 1875. Congress passed the act to guarantee blacks equal access to public accommodations and transportation. Section 1 of the act entitled all U.S. citizens “. . . to the full and equal enjoyment of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, and privileges of inns, public conveyances on land or water, theaters, and other places of public amusement; subject only to the conditions established by law, and applicable to citizens of every race and color, regardless of any previous condition of servitude.”35 The often poorly enforced law came under early and consistent fire from opponents, both in the North and South. Many whites charged that the act interfered with the legitimate rights of individuals to run their own businesses and the rights of state and municipal governments to regulate those businesses as well as its own institutions. Negroes however, as a rule, “were not aggressive in pressing their rights, even after they were assured them by law and protected in exercising them by the federal presence. It was easier to avoid painful rebuff or insult by refraining from the test of rights.”36

32 Ibid., 498-502.

Following passage of the act, the U. S. Supreme Court gave an indication of its stance on the constitutionality of segregation. In this case, black passenger Josephine DeCuir had sued the steamship captain of the Governor Allen for denying her admission to the stateroom reserved for whites on a trip between New Orleans, Louisiana, and Vicksburg, Mississippi. The suit charged that the policy violated Louisiana’s 1869 Civil Rights Act prohibiting racial discrimination in public transportation. In 1877, the Court unanimously ruled in the case of Hall v. DeCuir that state laws were not applicable to interstate vessels and that only Congress could regulate interstate commerce. The Court had reasoned that varying state regulations would be a burden on interstate commerce. Thus, states could not require interstate carriers to offer integrated facilities.37

Six years later in 1883, five challenges to the Civil Rights Act of 1875 reached the U. S. Supreme Court and were heard collectively as the Civil Rights Cases. In one of these cases, Bird Gee, an African American, attempted to get a meal in an inn owned by Murray Stanley in Kansas. Stanley refused to serve Gee who immediately filed a grievance with the U. S. District Attorney. On April 14, 1876, Stanley was indicted by a federal grand jury for refusing the “privileges of an inn to a person of color.” Stanley appealed to the federal circuit court, contending that Congress lacked constitutional authority to enact a public accommodations law. The circuit court was unable to reach a decision and sent the matter to the U.S. Supreme Court.38

The four companion cases came from other sectors of the country. Black patrons faced discrimination at the “dress circle” at Maguire’s Theater in San Francisco, the Grand Opera House in New York City, Nichol’s Inn in Missouri, and the “ladies car” on a train in Memphis, Tennessee. All but the Tennessee case were criminal prosecutions brought forth by the U.S. government. The fact that three of the cases came from the North and West and one from a border state demonstrated anew that segregation in public accommodations was a national, not just a southern, issue.39

In declaring the Civil Rights Act of 1875 unconstitutional, the Court said that the act was not authorized by either the Thirteenth or Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution. In essence, the Court found that individuals were protected from the infringement of their civil rights by federal and state governments, but not by other individuals. In his dissent, Justice John M. Harlan argued that the Thirteenth Amendment “did something more than to prohibit slavery as an institution,” and that Congress was authorized under the Fourteenth Amendment to pass laws governing both individual and state action in the field of civil rights.40

39 Miller, The Petitioners, 137.
40 Ibid.
While many whites applauded the Court’s decision, black spokespersons condemned it; some, in especially strong terms. African Methodist Episcopal (AME) Bishop Henry McNeal Turner, the leading supporter of black emigration to Africa in the last part of the 19th century, blasted the Supreme Court ruling as a “barbarous decision.” He said, “it reduces the majesty of the nation to an aggregation of ruffianism, opens all the issues of the late war, sets the country to wrangling again, puts the negro back into politics, revives the Ku-Klux Klan and the white leaguers, resurrects the bludgeons, sets men to cursing and blaspheming God and man, and literally unties the devil.”

The Supreme Court’s decision in many respects, simply codified what had taken place in much of the country, i.e., the exclusion by custom and law of blacks from most public facilities. It came in the wake of a growing movement, particularly in the South, to exclude and/or segregate blacks in such places. The extent and growing uniformity of such legislation led scholars and others to call the period the Era of Jim Crow.

Jim Crow Segregation

Following the civil rights cases, and the inability of the federal government to insure civil rights, states either passed their own equality laws or created laws that segregated but did so on the basis of equal accommodations. Between 1884 and 1887, Ohio, Nebraska, Indiana, Rhode Island, Michigan, Pennsylvania, and Massachusetts enacted provisions to prohibit discrimination based on race in accommodations and/or conveyances. New York, in 1893, added cemeteries as a place of no color distinction.

After Reconstruction, hotels and restaurants in New Orleans generally excluded blacks as whites “became committed to white supremacy and a caste system identified with the southern way of life.” As one journalist noted, “colored travellers, opera, minstrel, other troupes and excursionists are often in the papers with a tale of grievances about the hardships of travel because of caste distinctions by which they are kept out of the first-class hotels and public comforts.”

Challenges to segregation after passage of the 1875 Civil Rights Act had varying results. The Richmond Dispatch reported that blacks won access to one theater’s exclusive white dress circle. However, most attempts to integrate failed at theaters, hotels, bars, restaurants, and within transportation. In Augusta, blacks dined at separate tables at the Planter’s Hotel and in Montgomery’s Ruby Saloon they imbibed at a separate “small counter” away from the main bar.

Lack of black resistance was one of the reasons for the failure of a sustained opposition to segregation. Five prominent blacks in Nashville argued that Negroes would not invoke the Civil Rights Act “to make themselves obnoxious” since they “had too much self respect to go where they were not wanted . . . such actions would lead only to disturbances and ‘colored people wanted peace and as little agitation as possible.’” Another reason was based on making a living. Black business owners with a white clientele were hesitant to serve other blacks for fear of losing white business.

---

43 Ibid., 29 referencing New Orleans Southwestern Christian Advocate, March 24, 1887.
44 Rabinowitz, “From Exclusion to Segregation,” 336 referencing Richmond Dispatch, Dec. 9, 11, 1875.
46 Ibid., 346 quoting from the Atlanta Constitution, March 6, 1875.
For example, in Chattanooga, a black barber refused shaves for blacks. When black customers questioned whether their money was not as good as white money, the barber replied, “Yes just as good, but there is not enough of it.” While for others it meant losing their jobs should they choose to challenge access. Lastly, some blacks viewed the prospect of equal separate facilities as an improvement over exclusion.

While black opposition to segregation sometimes wavered, blacks at times used segregation as a way to control obnoxious whites. In 1866, a black rider on a Nashville streetcar “threatened a boycott unless the company protected black passengers from abusive whites who force their way onto the car and used obscene language in front of black women.” Colored theatergoers in Norfolk, Virginia petitioned the managers of a new opera house “to give them a respectable place to sit, apart from those of a lewd character.”

Following Reconstruction, Jim Crow legislation requiring separate railroad cars or compartments for blacks and whites became more common in the South, but not without protest. In 1887 civil rights activist Ida B. Wells, was dragged from the first-class ladies car to the car reserved for smokers and black passengers. Wells pressed charges and won her case in circuit court with headlines reading “Darker Damsel Obtains a Verdict for Damages Against the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad.” In a short victory for desegregation, the decision was reversed at the State Supreme Court.

As Jim Crow tightened its grip on freedom for blacks, a bright spot seemed to appear in the passage by Congress of the Interstate Commerce Act of 1887. This law included provisions for regulating railroad travel. Section 3 of the act required carriers to provide equal facilities for all passengers. The act also established the Interstate Commerce Commission (ICC) as the agency to implement the law and to investigate complaints. However, little changed as the ICC subsequently upheld “separate but equal” facilities, ruling only that separate and unequal accommodations violated Section 3 of the act.

“Separate but equal” became the basic framework of Jim Crow legislation. Between 1887 and 1892, Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, Maryland, North Carolina, Kentucky, South Carolina, Tennessee, and Virginia all enacted new segregation and discrimination laws. The Jim Crow laws differed in small particulars, but maintained a consistency in requiring separate accommodations for blacks and whites in transportation and most other public accommodations including hospitals, hotels, insane asylums, restaurants, saloons, prisons, theaters, and cemeteries. Even prostitution “suffered the effects of segregation.” In New Orleans, prostitutes serving both black and white men had become a rarity by 1880. In Atlanta, black and white prostitutes were confined to separate city blocks.

---

47 Ibid., 347, Chattanooga quote from the Cincinnati Commercial as quoted in the Nashville, Republican Banner, June 17, 1874.
48 Ibid., quoting from Nashville Press and Times, June 26, 1866, and the Richmond Virginia Star, March 27, 1880.
51 For information on the first Jim Crow laws see Eric Foner, America’s Black Past, 245-246, 250-251; Rabinowitz, “From Exclusion to Segregation,” 342-353. Virginia repealed its Jim Crow laws in 1904.
52 Rabinowitz, “From Exclusion to Segregation,” 337; Barnes, Journey from Jim Crow, 7-8.
Segregated conditions existed at other parks such as Atlanta’s Ponce de Leon Springs with its “separate dance halls and refreshments stands.” Only whites could use the new pavilion at Nashville’s Glendale Park and the swimming pool at Raleigh’s Brookside Park. A new zoo in Atlanta’s Grant Park opening in 1890 featured cages in the middle of the building with an aisle on one side for whites and an aisle on the other side for blacks. Some parks in the 1880s were open to both blacks and whites such as Nashville’s Watkins Park, Atlanta’s Grant Park and at Piedmont Park where the Atlanta Constitution reported that blacks and whites watched a Negro militia company drill.53

Many African Americans and their sympathizers and supporters among other racial and ethnic groups attacked the Black Codes and other Jim Crow legislation in word and deed. These efforts had already suffered a setback in the U. S. Supreme Court in 1890, when the Court upheld a Mississippi law that required separate accommodations for blacks and whites. Challenging this law was the Louisville, New Orleans, and Texas Railway Company claiming that separate accommodations placed an economic burden on interstate carriers. The decision was also contrary to the Court’s Hall ruling in 1877, which held that only Congress could regulate interstate travel. In its turnabout, the Court reasoned that the Mississippi law in the Louisville case was a regulation of intrastate commerce and therefore did not violate the commerce clause.54

A combination of other issues contributed to a wave of segregation laws in the South. Among these were scientific proof of the inferiority of the black race, the desire of Northerners to end sectional divisions, and the control of white Southerners over a “new generation of blacks” who would not know their place without legal force. In addition, agrarian dissenters, who had formed the 1890s Populist party, had struck a biracial alliance with black farmers who they viewed as being in the same situation as themselves in the agricultural depression. Conservative whites sought to eliminate the agrarian revolts by dividing the races. As a result black status fell and subsequently blacks faced voting registration requirements and racial violence. Into the early twentieth century, states passed laws codifying racial habits and customs.55

Booker T. Washington Speech

Some blacks acquiesced in the legislation and its resulting environment. Still others apparently defended the measures and their results. The most powerful and public black voice countenancing Jim Crow was that of Booker T. Washington. The principal of Tuskegee Institute in Alabama since 1881, Washington was born into slavery in Virginia in 1856. He worked his way through Hampton Institute in Virginia and became a protege of its white principal Samuel Armstrong. Armstrong was a strong supporter of agricultural-industrial education for the freedpersons as well as proponent of segregation. Washington seemed to adopt not only his mentor’s educational philosophy, but also much of his racial views. By the time Frederick Douglass, the preeminent black leader of the times, died in February 1895, Washington had obtained a national reputation for his educational work at Tuskegee. While raising funds for his school, Washington had also impressed Northern philanthropists and others with his racial approach, i. e., not agitating the questions of political rights

---

53 Rabinowitz, “From Exclusion to Segregation,” 338 referencing Nashville Banner, October 16, 1882, Atlanta Constitution, July 5, 10, 1890, and April 4, 1890.
54 Howard, Shifting Wind, 138-141; Barnes, Journey from Jim Crow, 7-8; Louisville, New Orleans, and Texas Railway Company v. Mississippi, 133 U.S. 587 (1890). or racial equality. Many blacks had also come to respect and admire him for his educational work at Tuskegee as well as his messages of industry, thrift, and uplift for their race.

In the fall of 1895, as the South celebrated almost three decades of economic progress at the Cotton States International Exposition in Atlanta, Georgia, its promoters felt that it was fitting to have a “Negro section,” and a black speaker to highlight the Southern blacks’ “progress.” They chose Booker T. Washington as the black spokesperson. Washington’s persona and his oratory exceeded all expectations. Washington espoused a belief that economic stability for blacks would in turn gain them political rights. His message helped to solidify the tone and the etiquette for race relations in the South, and much of the nation, for the next half-century. On September 15, 1895, Washington told his segregated audience, including some of the South’s most prominent white leaders and reporters from the national press, that:

As we have proved our loyalty to you in the past, in nursing your children, watching by the sick-bed of your mothers and fathers . . . we shall stand by you with a devotion that no foreigner can approach, ready to lay down our lives, if need be, in defense of yours, interlacing our industrial, commercial, civil, and religious life with yours in a way that shall make the interests of both races one. In all things that are purely social we can be as separate as the fingers, yet one as the hand in all things essential to mutual progress (emphasis added).

Washington’s speech became controversial, even as he delivered it. Most of the whites in the audience cheered it enthusiastically; some blacks were seen crying. The address was widely reported in the press and drew immediate national reaction. President Grover Cleveland wrote Washington a note of congratulations saying that, “Your words cannot fail to delight and encourage all who wish well for your race; and if our coloured fellow citizens do not from your utterances gather new hope and form new determinations to gain every valuable advantage offered them by their citizenship, it will be strange indeed.” The editor of The Atlanta Constitution called the speech “a revelation.”

Black reaction to Washington’s speech was mixed. W. E. B. Du Bois, who was soon to emerge as one of the leading black spokespersons of the times and a later critic of Washington, sent Washington a letter congratulating him on his “phenomenal success at Atlanta.” He said the speech was “a word fitly spoken.” Du Bois later wrote in the New York Age, that Washington’s views “might be the basis of a real settlement between whites and blacks in the South.”

One of the first black opponents, AME Bishop Turner, stated that:

. . . the great professor adjudged it prudent and discreet to pass by those phases of our barbarous civilization, as well as the efforts being made to disfranchise the Negro in some of the states. . . . [S]ocial equality carries with it civil equality, political equality, financial

---

58 Ibid., 143-144.
equality, judicial equality, business equality, and wherever social equality is denied by legislative enactments and judicial decrees, the sequel must be discrimination, proscription, injustice and degradation.

. . . With all due respect to Prof. Washington personally, for we do respect him personally, he will have to live a long time to undo the harm he has done to our race . . . 60

Whatever some blacks thought about Washington’s racial philosophy as expressed at the Cotton States Exposition, later events were to prove it almost prophetic. For within a year after the Atlanta address, the U. S. Supreme Court made his philosophy of race relations “the law of the land.”

Plessy v. Ferguson, 1896

The case of Plessy v. Ferguson, which supplied the occasion for the court’s landmark decision, had its origins in Louisiana. In 1890, Louisiana passed a law calling for “equal but separate” accommodations on railroads for “whites” and “coloreds.” Protesting this law was a group of Creoles and blacks who formed the Citizens Committee to Test the Constitutionality of the Separate Car Law. This group arranged a test case along with the railroad that opposed the law due to the expense of supplying another car. An “exceedingly light-skinned Negro” named Homer Plessy agreed to test the law. Plessy was subsequently arrested for sitting in the white car. 61 In his defense, Plessy contended that the Louisiana statute requiring segregation was unconstitutional. On appeal to the U. S. Supreme Court, Plessy’s attorneys argued that if the segregation law was upheld, states could “require separate cars for people with different colors of hair, aliens, or Catholics or Protestants or to require colored people to walk on one side of the street and white people on the other side, or to demand that white men’s homes be painted white and black men’s homes black.” 62

In 1896, the Supreme Court decided against Plessy. Justice Henry Billings Brown writing for the majority concluded that legislative bodies were “powerless to eradicate racial instincts,” and that “if one race be inferior to the other socially, the Constitution of the United States cannot put them on the same plane.” Equal rights did not necessitate the “enforced commingling of the two races.” 63 In his lone and now famous dissent, Justice John Harlan offered that “Our Constitution is color blind, and neither knows nor tolerates classes among citizens.” 64 Thus the notion of “separate but equal” had been judicially sanctioned by the nation’s highest court and Jim Crow had been given a new birth—a new license to “jump up and down.” 65 State laws mandating racial segregation quickly followed the Plessy ruling ensuring a Jim Crow system in the South. The most blacks could aspire for was equal accommodations.

60 Redkey, Respect Black, 165-166.
62 Howard, Shifting Wind, 143-144.
63 Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537 (1896) at 559; Thomas, Plessy, 50-51.
65 Hine, et al., The African-American Odyssey, 153, 316. In its opinion, the Supreme Court had singled out the separate but equal aspect addressed in Massachusetts in the Roberts v. City of Boston case of 1849 in which the states’ Supreme Court had found separate but equal schools valid despite the fact that later, in 1855, the Massachusetts legislature enacted a law prohibiting school segregation.
Plessy v. Ferguson provoked a huge outpouring of public reaction. Supporters of the decision included much of the southern press and some of the northern news media, law professors, students and journalists, political and religious leaders, and businessmen. The Rochester, New York, Union Advertiser saw the decision as a victory for states’ rights, saying that, “[t]he question was purely one of state power.” The Richmond, Virginia, Dispatch alleged that “[s]ome colored people make themselves so disagreeable on the cars that their conduct leads white men to ponder the question whether such a law as that of Louisiana is not needed in all the Southern States.”

Public opponents included some of the white press, some white social and political leaders, much of the black press and leading black spokespersons. The New York Tribune found that it was “unfortunate . . . that our highest court has declared itself in opposition to the effort to expunge race lines in State legislation.” The A. M. E. Church Review typified reaction in the black press and much of black America. In an editorial in June 1896, the periodical of one of the largest African American religious denominations observed that “. . . the Court virtually takes the position that any law not involving the rights of the Negro to sit upon juries and to vote, is unconstitutional, on the ground that race conflicts will arise, if the prejudices of large numbers of the white race are thwarted.”

One of the first prominent black spokesmen to react was the “accommodationist” Booker T. Washington. Washington, who secretly sponsored civil rights suits and attacked racism in his later years, believed that the “separate but equal doctrine:”

. . . may be good law, but it is not good common sense. The difference in the color of the skin is a matter for which nature is responsible. If the Supreme Court can say that it is unlawful to compel all persons with black skins to ride in one car, and all with white skins to ride in another, why may it not say that it is lawful to put all yellow people in one car and all white people, whose skin is sun burnt, in another car. . . .

But the colored people do not complain so much of the separation, as of the fact that the accommodations, with almost no exceptions, are not equal, still the same price is charged the colored passengers as is charged the white people.

The National Federation of Afro-American Women condemned the court’s decision, and in a resolution that foretold of future boycotts, proclaimed that:

So long as we continue to spend thousands of dollars every year on needless excursions, we enrich the railroads at our expense. Cut off this source of revenue because of the “Jim Crow Car” into which the wives, mothers, sisters and daughters of the race are forced to ride and the railroads will fight the separate car law through self interest.

---

66 Thomas, Plessy, 128-134 including quoted materials; Kluger, Simple Justice, 72-73.
67 Thomas, Plessy, 128, 131, 134.
69 Thomas, Plessy, 135.
70 Coleman, “Black Women and Segregated Public Transportation,” 298, quoting from The History of the National Club Movement Among Colored Women of the United States, as Contained in the Minutes of the Convention Held in Boston, July 29, 30, 31, 1893, and the National Federation of Afro-American Women, Held in Washington, D.C., July 20, 21, 22,
SEGREGATION OF LATINA/OS IN THE 19TH CENTURY

In the nineteenth century, Mexicans began the century as a people who exercised segregation over groups different from themselves, but by the end of the century they became subject to such policies and practices. During the early period, Spanish elites segregated native people into missions and rancherias (settlements) in an area regarded today as the U.S. Southwest. As Mexico won its independence and a more secular order took hold after 1821, Mexican elites (gente de razón) continued to segregate Indians and poor mestizos (people thought to be of mixed backgrounds) in separate living quarters, though how this segregation was practiced in public accommodations is unclear. Typically, male ranch owners invested in elaborate fiestas that involved the entire community as a way of affirming their superior position within that society. As well, it was not unusual for an elite to become a padrino (godfather) to an Indian or poor mestizo whom he thought of as an inferior. Both practices demonstrate that people of privilege in society valued interaction over separation in dealing with people they saw as their inferiors, and that segregation in public accommodations would have worked against the desired goals of the elite.

Elite Mexican and Indian women within Spanish/Mexican frontier society also experienced a degree of familiarity, though class backgrounds shaped their relationships. For example, according to historian Miroslava Chávez, when the detribalized Indian servant, Ysabel, tried to quit as a house servant for the elite Guadalupe Trujillo and her family, Trujillo slashed Ysabel throat, killing her. Trujillo was found guilty of the crime, however, the courts revoked the initial light sentence of three years of seclusion and ordered her instead to remain near her family at the port of San Diego for just one year. The incident reveals that while women of different status lived together within close quarters, elite Mexican women had significant control over the movement and civil rights of Indian women servants. In cases involving non-Christian, tribal Indians (gente sin razón) and people of mixed heritage such as the genizara/os in New Mexico who lived on the margins of society, separation was preferred and enforced.

The U.S.-Mexican War of 1846-1848 transformed the homelands of all Mexicans, but did not immediately displace them, especially the landowning class. Under the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo that ended the war, Mexican landowning families who chose to remain in the “new” territories of the United States, after one year, became U.S. citizens. Under the treaty, they also had their rights to their land recognized and were generally regarded by law as white. In California, for example, Mexican elected officials participated in the framing of the state Constitution that denied civil rights to Indians and restricted rights to blacks. These same officials also helped pass the 1850 Foreign Miners’ Tax targeting Chinese and immigrant Mexican and Latin American miners and the 1855 Vagrancy Act that sanctioned the arrest and imprisonment of “idle” Indians and Mexicans of lower-class status. Both of these legislative acts unfairly targeted racial minorities and immigrants, and instilled fear in the hearts of Chinese, Indians, and segments of the Mexican population who could be rounded up for their public appearance and behavior.\(^{75}\)

During the last half of the nineteenth century, Mexican Americans saw a steady erosion of their political influence and their economic status, and faced threats to their political rights, institutions, and culture. Although some had played a role in the liberation of Texas from the centrist Mexican government of Santa Anna, and had contributed to the stability of state governments in the aftermath of the U.S.-Mexican War, Mexican Americans fell into a period of uncertainty and violence as a result of white acts of aggression and discrimination. Regarded as “half-civilized” and part of a bygone era, Mexican Americans of all classes actively and often painfully adjusted to the cultural environment of their conquerors. Mexican American responses, however, were tempered by two circumstances which, when taken together, made the Mexican American past distinct from any other ethnic group in the United States. First, whites retained prejudices toward Mexican Americans on racial and cultural grounds. Mexican Americans with dark skin and Indian features had an especially difficult time being accepted within Anglo American culture. Generally, lighter-skinned elites found it easier to assimilate, but even they had to make adjustments to fit in. Second, new immigration from geographically contiguous Mexico continued throughout the nineteenth century and increased dramatically in the twentieth century, and constantly nourished Mexican culture in the Southwest, and helped Mexican people to withstand challenges to their existence.

In California, the flood of Anglo American migrants in search of gold and land placed Mexicans at a numerical disadvantage and made Mexicans a minority in a short period of time. In the 1840s, there were approximately 10,000 Californios to 1,000 Anglo Americans and Europeans, but by the 1850s, over 100,000 Anglo Americans and Europeans called California their home. Mexican Americans declined from 82% of the population in 1850 to 19% in 1880, a demographic shift that produced grave political consequences for them. Californios (elite California Mexicans) who held government positions soon after the war had difficulty getting elected by a growing Anglo majority who harbored antipathies towards Mexicans and favored Anglo candidates. Eventually, Californios lost political power, which would not return until the mid-twentieth century.\(^{76}\)

Mexican Californians fell from their economic perch as well, as drought devastated the cattle-raising rancho culture. Anglo squatters moved into the state, settling on Mexican lands and challenging their land claims. Although Congress established a land commission under the Land Law of 1851 to sort out these conflicts, the act of defending claims tended to be time consuming, alienating, and costly for Mexican landholders and led to the loss of many acres.\(^{77}\) Between 1862 and 1864, Mexican rancheros suffered when the rains virtually ceased in Southern California. In Los Angeles County seven out of every ten range cattle were lying dead by the end of 1863; possibly 3 million were dead by 1864. The collapse of the ranchos meant dislocation for both the elite Californios and the poorer classes of mestizos and Indians who worked for them. Some of the sons and daughters of once wealthy families married into incoming Anglo American families; others sank into poverty. Only their memories of better times distinguished them from the numerous vaqueros (Mexican cowboys), shepherders, and skilled rural workers whose jobs vanished with the ranchos. In towns such as Santa Barbara, Los Angeles, and San Diego, Anglo immigrants who gained ownership of the ranchos and Mexican communal lands converted them into farms and orchards. This in turn meant a decline in the demand for the labor of shepherds and vaqueros. Many Mexican Americans tried to maintain their hold on these traditional skilled jobs of Mexican California by seeking work in California’s Central Valley, but their attempts only turned them into migrant workers traveling far from home. Some Mexicans in California gave up on the United States altogether and moved to Mexico, while others looked for work in the emerging urban economy of the U.S. West.78

The experience of Hispanos (Mexicans in New Mexico) differed from those of California only in degree. Although some members of the Hispano elite prospered after the war, most Spanish-speaking New Mexicans struggled to maintain their lands and way of life. The small landholders and communal villagers of northern New Mexico suffered crippling losses first through the frauds that deprived many villages of their lands and then, more seriously, by the refusal of Congress and the Court of Private Land Claims, established in 1891, to grant them title to their traditional communal holdings. Most villagers managed to retain their small, irrigated plots, but the courts refused to recognize their rights to the ejidos, or communal grazing lands, that belonged to the villagers as a whole. As these lands fell into the hands of large cattle companies, the villagers could no longer maintain their own herds. To replace herding in the economy, men began to migrate out of the villages to seek seasonal work in the mines, railroads, ranches, and farms of Colorado and New Mexico. By the early twentieth century whole families were becoming migrant workers.79

Tejanos shared elements of both the Californian and the New Mexican experience. Before the war, elite Mexican families between the Nueces and the Rio Grande held the land through a system of derechos, or rights. Under Mexican law families, not individuals, owned these lands. Under U.S. law, however, the lands became subdivided among heirs, who could sell them without regard to family claims. Land became a commodity—a thing for sale on the market. Mexican Texans lost control of their land through outright fraud and coercion and because of their reluctance to transform their ranches into capitalist enterprises. Complicating matters, many Tejanos distrusted and in some cases feared the Texas Rangers who used the law to help wealthy Anglo ranchers expropriate the land of their neighbors.

Mexican Texans and more recent Mexican immigrants remained a majority (73%) in South Texas during the last half of the nineteenth century, but they became an increasingly impoverished majority. By the late nineteenth century, when South Texas became a center of large-scale commercial agriculture, Mexican Texans had become a group of unskilled rural laborers.80

Accompanying the loss of political and economic security, Mexicans also experienced incidents of racial violence and discrimination before, during, and after the Mexican War. Juan Séguin, for example, fought in the war for Texas Independence, but was eventually run out of Texas by Anglo settlers who refused to recognize his leadership. Following the battle of San Jacinto, Seguín was elected a senator of the new Republic and served several terms as mayor of San Antonio. Then, in 1842, Anglo newcomers chased him from office at gunpoint, seized his land, and forced him to flee to Mexico.81

78 Almaguer, Racial Fault Lines, 45-104.
79 White, "It's Your Misfortune and None of My Own," 240-241.
80 Arnoldo De León, Mexican Americans in Texas, second ed. (Wheeling, IL: Harlan Davidson, Inc., 1999), Chapter 3.
81 Ibid. David J. Weber, ed., Foreigners in Their Native Land: Historical Roots of the Mexican Americans
In California, similar acts of intimidation occurred in rural and urban areas. In Northern California, white migrants attacked Chinese, Chileans, Peruvians, and Sonoran (Mexican) miners, and used violence along with the Foreign Miner’s Tax to retain exclusive access to goldfields. In the mining town of Downieville, an angry mob of white miners lynched a Mexican woman remembered only as Josefa for the offense of killing a man in self-defense as he entered her bedroom one evening. “Had this woman been an American instead of a Mexican,” one newspaper wrote, “instead of being hung for the deed, she would have been lauded for it. It was not her guilt which condemned this unfortunate woman, but her Mexican blood.”

In urban Los Angeles, Mexicans were more numerous, but still encountered hostility. White vigilantes often attacked poor Mexicans for committing petty thefts and lynched Mexicans on a regular basis. By the mid-1880s, Los Angeles became the most violent place in the U.S., recording a murder a day. Whites called the Mexican barrio of Los Angeles, “Sonoratown,” and believed these people to be racially inferior to Anglos. Anglo city officials denied basic civic needs to the Mexican neighborhoods, such as sewage drains and running water, which led to epidemics and sanitation crises. White vigilantes called the main street through the barrio “Nigger Alley,” and often carried out public hangings of Mexican and Indian petty criminals to warn others against committing crimes. The violence of downtown and residential discrimination forced many Mexicans to seek sanctuary across the Los Angeles River, and to establish a barrio in unincorporated East Los Angeles. There they lived with newly emigrated immigrants from Eastern Europe.

Some Mexicans chose a confrontational response to the violence through social banditry. For some Mexican Americans, “Bandidos” (bandits) such as Tiburcio Vasquez and Joaquin Murrieta functioned like Mexican “Robin Hoods,” allegedly raiding Anglo ranches and wrestling cattle away from these ranch owners to feed the poor and their families. White vigilantes took a special disliking to these individuals and united with some upper class Californios to catch these bandits. For example, a group known as the “El Monte Boys,” composed of some Californio elites and Anglo Americans formed to quell such rebellions. The El Monte Boys were led by several former Texas Rangers—a para-state police organization infamous for violent attacks on Mexicans in Texas—who had helped found El Monte as the first separate, all-white township in Southern California.

In Texas, many Tejanos came to see both state and local police as agents of oppression. In 1859 in South Texas, a region overwhelmingly Mexican in population, Juan Cortina, a 35-year old son of a prominent Tejano family shot the sheriff of Brownsville, Bob Spears, for pistol-whipping a drunken vaquero who worked for his mother. Predicting a violent reaction from Anglos, Cortina left town immediately, but within two months, returned with sixty riders. Cortina freed all the Tejano prisoners in the jail, sacked the stores owned by white merchants, and executed four Americans for their part in the murder of Mexican Texans. In time, Cortina’s ability to avoid capture by both Texas 84 Camarillo, Chicanos in a Changing Society, Chapter 5.

Rangers and Mexican troops earned him legendary status among many Mexican people living along the border.86

Towards the end of the nineteenth century, as whites enacted de jure segregation as a backlash to the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Amendments, the question of whether or not Mexicans came under the mandate of these discriminatory laws became salient. Although the government had labeled most Mexicans white, many argued that their Indian ancestry should disqualify them as equals. On the other hand, since Mexicans did not practice a tribal government and thus could not be classified as Indian, their racial status remained at best ambiguous. Evaluating the history of social relations between Mexicans and whites reveals that the white majority often regarded Mexicans as non-white despite laws and treaty agreements that suggested otherwise.

The U.S. Supreme Court’s 1883 landmark decision in the Civil Rights Cases that upheld the right of business owners to provide segregated service or to deny service based on race, extended beyond African Americans to include all racial minorities. In making its decision, the Court majority opined that by allowing racial minorities to be in public places forced whites to interact with them, and therefore infringed upon the civil rights of white people. The Court also ruled that excluding non-whites from public places did not violate their Thirteenth and Fourteenth Amendment rights because it had been a privilege, not a right granted to them to interact with whites before the enforcement of segregation. In Plessy v. Ferguson (1896), the U.S. Supreme Court’s ruling had legalized all forms of social segregation and gave states the power to determine if any racial minority groups should be segregated. Although not directed at Mexicans, the Plessy decision reinforced the Mexicans’ inferior status by giving states the power to treat them as such.87

The conflict between Anglos and Mexicans in the West indicated a shift in the social position of Mexicans after the Mexican War. At mid-century, the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo and the election of Mexican candidates gave some Mexicans reason to believe that they would be accepted as equals to Anglo Americans. However, voting trends, legal and extralegal violence, and discrimination and segregation of Mexicans throughout the region indicated that, though they were “white by law,” most Anglos regarded Mexicans as racial inferiors. The hostility and abuse against Mexicans at the close of the 19th century set the tone for race relations in the Southwest during the 20th century.

---

PART TWO, 1900-1941
THE AGE OF JIM CROW TO WORLD WAR II

After Plessy “settled the race question,” the mode of race relations which Jim Crow laws had prescribed became the acceptable standards of conduct for public facilities across the nation; although their major impact was in the South where the vast majority of blacks still lived. While only three states required segregated waiting rooms prior to 1899, within the next decade several other states followed. Other laws excluded blacks from Pullman cars, steamboats, and streetcars. Trolley car segregation in particular continued to be a major object of black protest. In most places streetcar companies opposed these laws for fear of lost revenues from declining black patronage, enforcement difficulties, and the cost of adding separate cars for blacks. At times, the streetcar company reversed its position based on public sentiment. Some bills never passed, while others were delayed.88

Documentation exists from 1900 to the 1940s on the resentment blacks had toward Jim Crow carriers as described in Catherine Barnes’s Journey from Jim Crow. One observer of the early 1900s noted in the South that “No other point of race contact is so much and so bitterly discussed among the Negroes as the Jim Crow.” Barnes wrote “that the Jim Crow car was for many people a symbol of the entire order of racial separation in the South,” and that the humiliation was associated with its role in “the daily routine of life.”89

But, while the standards of conduct became acceptable, they were not always accepted. Many blacks and their allies in other racial and ethnic groups continued to press legal and extra-legal challenges to the separate but equal doctrine. They saw such continued agitation and protest as urgent, even an instrument of survival, as they came to believe that the environment sustained by Plessy nurtured the continued violence perpetrated against African Americans.

Boycotts

In the face of cresting Southern racism supported by the separate-but-equal doctrine, Negro disfranchisement, and northern white indifference, blacks relied on boycotts as a way to protest oppression without confrontation. Every southern state experienced these boycotts for a period of anywhere from weeks to three years. Highly influential in these boycotts was an elite group of business and professional men, newspaper editors, and some ministers. Their participation was reflective of a conservative black leadership in the South at a time of accommodation as a way “to preserve dignity in the face of a humiliating social change.” As historians August Meier and Elliot Rudwick explain, the boycott was “a multifaceted response to oppression that protested and yet avoided confrontation with the discriminating whites. . . . By attacking and yet withdrawing, the boycotters . . . were both protesting against race prejudice and accommodating to it.” It was, as Meier and Rudwick add, “the least militant variety of what today is called nonviolent direct action.”90 For some blacks, boycotting came easy in the light of Jim Crow humiliation. Others 88

---

89 Barnes, Journey from Jim Crow, 18.
boycotted under peer pressure. In Savannah, blacks opposed to the boycotts were “publicly denounced at mass meetings as ‘demagogues and hypocrites,’” and on the downtown street corners blacks “heckled riders as they got off and urged those ready to board the trolleys to take a hack instead.”

To cope with transportation needs during the boycotts, blacks either walked to work or used their own system of wagons, carriages, and hacks. Besides an informal transit system, blacks also considered forming their own transit companies. Two such systems functioned in Virginia and Tennessee in 1905 and 1906 respectively. These systems showed a shift by blacks toward “economic advancement, self-help, and racial solidarity.”

In one amusing turnabout, blacks used their informal system to exclude or segregate whites during a 1904 streetcar strike in Houston that left whites walking. A local news story reported how a black driver refused to provide a ride to a white businessman because the city council would not let blacks and whites ride together. In a more direct affront, some black conveyances had “a space in the rear some two feet in length blocked off by a piece of cardboard bearing the legend, ‘For Whites Only.’”

Between 1900-1906, twenty-five southern cities experienced streetcar boycotts. At the turn of the century many city or state ordinances required streetcar segregation in the states of Georgia, Florida, Alabama, South Carolina, Texas, Virginia, Louisiana, Tennessee, Mississippi, Oklahoma, and North Carolina. Boycotts lasted anywhere from weeks to up to three years and protests occurred in all the former Confederate states. Some newspapers commented on the effectiveness of the boycotts. In May 1900, the Augusta Chronicle reported: “It was noticeable that the negroes did not take to the cars as usual on Sunday. On about every fourth car passing one or two could be seen...” After passage of streetcar segregation laws in Mobile in November 1902, the Daily Register reported that “nearly all of them are walking.” Newspapers in New Orleans observed that “there were so many empty seats in the Negro compartment that the whites bitterly resented having to stand.” Reports in the colored press (referred to as “colored weeklies” by Meier and Rudwick) were supportive. The Atlanta Age stated “that you can stand on the streets all day and never see a Negro riding.”

Organizing

Overall, boycotts that succeeded were temporary due to a lack of black political power, disfranchisement, and the absence of federal authority from either the courts or military officials who had left the South. Remarking on the inevitable failure of the boycotts in their study of the

---

92 Ibid., 274.
93 Ibid., 273-274, quote from story in the Houston Daily Post, June 3, 1904.
94 Ibid., 268-269, 283.
95 Ibid., 271 citing from Augusta Chronicle, May 21, 1900; Mobile Daily Register, Nov. 4, 11, 1902; New Orleans Times-Democrat, Nov. 4, 6, 1902, and New Orleans Southwestern Christian Advocate, Nov. 6, 1902; and the Atlanta Age, n.d., quoted in Richmond Planet, April 7, 1900.
96 Barnes, Journey from Jim Crow, 12.
streetcar boycott movement, Meier and Rudwick found it noteworthy that the boycotts “happened in so many places and lasted as long as they often did.”

Besides boycotts, one formal group of individuals gathered to rail against the degrading conditions of blacks nationwide and other racial issues. These individuals assembling near Niagara Falls in 1905, officially abandoned any previous acquiescence to separate-but-equal and demanded full equality of rights. Led by W. E. B. Du Bois and William Monroe Trotter, editor of the Boston Guardian (a weekly newspaper on race relations), the group of notable black ministers, journalists, educators, businesspersons, lawyers and others declared that:

Any discrimination based simply on race or color is barbarous, we care not how hallowed it be by custom, expediency, or prejudice. . . . [D]iscrimination based simply and solely on physical peculiarities, place of birth, color [of] skin, are relics of that unreasoning human savagery of which the world is and ought to be ashamed. We protest against the ‘Jim Crow’ car, since its effect is and must be to make us pay first-class fare for third-class accommodations, render us open to insults and discomfort, and to crucify wantonly our manhood, womanhood, and self-respect. . . .

The organization was called the Niagara Movement whose purpose was to renounce Washington’s conciliatory approach with a militant alternative. A year later, the Niagara Movement demanded an end to discrimination in public accommodations citing that “Separation in railway and street cars, based simply on race, is un-American, undemocratic, and silly.” Lacking mass support, the group dissolved in 1911. Some of its members, such as Du Bois, had already joined with white liberals in 1909 to form the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP).

The NAACP placed an emphasis on ending rail discrimination practices following the U.S. Supreme Court’s ruling in a 1914 transportation case that found in favor of the interests of black travelers. In McCabe v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway, the Court ruled that an Oklahoma act authorizing railroad companies to provide Pullman cars for whites, but none for blacks, could be seen as a denial of equal protection. It further found that the law had to apply equally to an individual as it would to a group, otherwise it made a constitutional right dependent upon being part of a group. Because of procedural problems, this portion of the statute was not enjoined, however the ruling provided standing for individual blacks to file suit for equal accommodations that would prove crucial in future litigation almost three decades later. While initially promising, legal battles against public carriers waned during and after World War I. During the war, the NAACP abandoned its effort to end rail discrimination when the federal government took over the rail lines and refused to halt

97 Meier and Rudwick, “Boycott Movement,” 284.
99 “W.E.B. DuBois addresses the second annual meeting of the Niagara Conference, Harpers Ferry, WV, August 16, 1906,” www.pbs.org/greatspeeches/timeline/web_dubois_s.html, assessed on April 18, 2003. In his introduction DuBois states that “Discrimination in travel and public accommodations has so spread that some of our weaker brethren are actually afraid to thunder against color discrimination as such and are simply whispering for ordinary decencies.” Meier and Rudwick noted that the Niagara Movement provided no support for the streetcar protests of the early 20th century, only proclaiming that the black-owned transportation companies were exemplary business enterprises, “Boycott Movement,” 282.
segregation, even for black military men. After the war the organization lacked the resources to commence a full-scale attack aimed specifically on segregated public carriers.

Segregation in the Federal Government

Officially sanctioned racial discrimination even reentered institutions of the federal government during Woodrow Wilson’s administration—thus reversing fifty years of integrated civil service. This policy was unexpected by the many blacks that had supported Wilson in the 1912 election, believing him to be a Progressive who would deal fairly with Negroes in promoting their interests in the country. But this period of social protest and economic reform was limited to the benefit of the white world at a time of pervasive Negro disfranchisement and all-out state sponsored discrimination. In writing on Wilsonian segregation, historian Nancy Weiss noted that “white America linked Progressive democracy and equality to greater separation from Negroes.” Wilson’s stance with blacks suffered further when he and his cabinet attended a private viewing of “The Birth of a Nation” at the White House. In 1914, nation wide protests emerged over this controversial D. W. Griffith film depicting “vicious distortions of Negro activities during the Reconstruction era” that “infused new life into the Ku Klux Klan.”

In the summer of 1913, those working in federal departments were relegated to segregated toilets, lunchroom facilities, and work areas, and anyone applying for a federal job now had to add a photo to their application. In 1913 and 1914, blacks reacted. Civil rights advocate and federal employee Mary Church Terrell desegregated restrooms in her work area after threatening to go public with the arrangement. Likewise in 1914, a delegation of Negro leaders, led by William Monroe Trotter, met Wilson at the White House whereupon the group “detailed instances of continued segregation, charged certain officials with race prejudice, asked for investigation and redress by executive order, and predicted Negro opposition to the Democrats in 1916.” Wilson asserted that segregation enforcement was “for the comfort and best interest of both races in order to overcome friction.” The president abruptly ended the contentious meeting. Among the factors that may have contributed to the failure to integrate the federal government was the lack of “a cohesive, tightly organized program” during a time when fights against lynching and the right to vote took on more prominence than “gaining political positions.”

100 Barnes, Journey from Jim Crow, 12-13, 17; McCabe v. Atchison, Topeka, & Santa Fe Railway Co., 235 U.S. 151 (1914). In this case, the Atchison, Topeka, and Santa Fe Railroad Company had not supplied a separate black Pullman car because of the costs involved.
102 Ibid., 556; KKK quote from Mark Grossman, The ABC-CLIO Companion to the Civil Rights Movement (Santa Barbara, Calif. : ABC-CLIO, 1993), 16.
103 www.pbs.org/wnet/jimcrow/stories_events.html under List of Events, 1913. White and colored clerks working on federal postal cars slept in the same cars and terminals without separate accommodations, because according to the post office department, the matter was out of its control. Under the situation there was “...a growing discontent on the part of the white postal clerks to be so intimately associated with the colored clerks.” Stephenson, “Separation of Races,” 198, quoting from the News and Observer, Raleigh, N.C., March 12, 1907.
World War I to the 1930s

An increased desire and urgency of many African Americans for full equality came with their participation in World War I and the great migration of more than one million blacks by 1918 who had left the South for jobs in the North and the West. During this time, Marcus Garvey, a Jamaican activist, introduced an alternative to integration espoused by the NAACP. On August 1, 1914, Garvey founded the Universal Negro Improvement Association, a separatist movement that attracted a lower social and economic level of blacks than the NAACP and “promoted black social and moral independence within white society.” He exalted race pride and “everything black.” He received a wide following in the early 1920s that “offered the best testimony to the sense of betrayal the war and its aftermath kindled in black communities.” His rise declined in 1923 after being convicted of fraud in the conduct of his steamship line.

Overall, black hopes for equality were diminished in the summer of 1919 that marked a new watershed in racial disturbances that “spread like wildfire” across the nation. The worst riot began on a Lake Michigan beach in Chicago when a black boy drifted into the “whites only” swimming area. White swimmers demanded that the boy return to his section of the beach and some threw stones at him. The youth drowned, but there was no indication that he had been stoned. Rumors of the incident sparked thirteen days of violence despite the presence of the state militia. In the end 38 people died, including 15 whites and 23 blacks, and 537 people were injured.

Direct action protest against segregated public accommodations was unusual during this time period. One reported incident occurred in a 1929 black boycott of a Detroit White Tower restaurant in a ghetto because the other chain’s branches would not serve them. In this environment, the 1920s-1930s gave way to segregation on local and long distance buses and in the 1930s, Jim Crow laws became effective on buses and in bus depots in eleven southern states. While airline segregation by companies did not last, airport terminals segregated their facilities in the South through either custom or by law in the 1930s-1940s.

Discrimination in the New Deal Era

The Great Depression of the 1930s, the New Deal, and the years leading up to the United States’ entry into World War II were momentous for the whole nation. Like all Americans, African Americans suffered through the travails of the economic collapse and rallied with the New Deal. Yet, Jim Crow still lurked and loomed large in the everyday lives of black Americans. An example of daily life can be gleaned from the Federal Writer’s Project of the Works Progress Administration that undertook the publication of state guidebooks in the 1930s. As part of the “Negro Studies” project, black writers recorded data concerning racial practices. In Arkansas, questionnaires were sent to survey accommodations available for black tourists. The Secretary of the Chamber of Commerce in Cotter, Arkansas replied:

. . . there is no discrimination against the negro tourists in this section of the State. All garages and service stations give to the negro the same courteous treatment as to whites.

Franklin, From Slavery to Freedom, 472, 482.

Hotels and tourist camps up to this time have made no provision as to sleeping quarters for negroes, but cafes and hotels do furnish meals. Negro drivers for white tourists are furnished with sleeping quarters. I do not know of any negro tourists having applied for and been refused sleeping quarters, but they might have difficulty in securing same. However, they would be politely refused and not mistreated.

Baxter County does not have a negro within its bounds, and the negro tourist trade is not sufficient to justify preparation for same, or the furnishing of accommodations. Vacant lots and city park are available to the Negro, for camping purposes, without cots.

The “Gypsy” is about the only one against whom a prejudice exists in Baxter County.

The president of the Chamber of Commerce in Newport, Arkansas wrote:

I do not think that there is any section in the state of Arkansas that the negro would be discriminated against as long as he knows his place and most of our southern negroes do. However, the negroes from the north and east are not familiar with the conditions and laws in the south especially, in Arkansas, and would possibly have a right to feel that they are being discriminated against. For reason they are not allowed certain privileges of the white people. Namely, eating at the same table, rooms at the same hotel, riding in the same sections on trains. Divisions are made of the passengers in buses, trolley cars and other conveyances. These are laws our state enforces very rigidly.110

Protests against such discrimination remained at the grassroots level. Although the NAACP was able to devote some attention to complaints against Jim Crow carriers in the 1930s, its limited funding was directed toward its campaign to end discrimination in public education. Thus, in the 1930s, direct action protests came into prominence as blacks lost economic ground and society experienced a “general leftward drift.” In the realm of public accommodations, Communist party activities were the major drive. This was especially true in the North, and less so in the Border States and the Upper South. As early as 1929, Communists held demonstrations in various places of public accommodation in cities like New York, Cleveland, and Pittsburgh at a time when direct action against segregated accommodations was uncommon. These protests continued into the Depression, but by the mid-1930s, protests declined with later incidents mainly occurring at hotels associated with Communist conventions. Black sponsored protests in the Upper South and Border States concentrated on a fairer application of accommodations, as opposed to integration, in mostly theaters and auditoriums. Picketing and boycotts occurred in cities such as Raleigh, Richmond, and St. Louis. In Washington, D.C., blacks protested at the National Theater after being relegated to side entrances, undesirable seating, and total exclusion.111

President Franklin D. Roosevelt, the architect of the New Deal, had been elected in 1936 with unprecedented black support for a Democrat. He, and particularly his wife, Eleanor, had expressed some progressive views, even on racial matters. Mrs. Roosevelt often backed up her words with deeds. For example, while attending a meeting of the Southern Conference for Human Welfare in Birmingham in 1938, she defied the city’s segregation ordinance and its Police Chief, Eugene “Bull” Connor who threatened to arrest anyone who crossed racial lines by placing her chair directly on the line dividing whites and blacks.112

But her husband had to construct his New Deal assault on the nation’s economic and social ills amid often open, and powerful, opposition from southern Democrats. New Deal benefits to blacks came in the form of economic assistance rather than civil rights, and New Deal programs generally did not challenge segregation. The Civilian Conservation Corps remained segregated in the South, but during its existence, about 200,000 blacks worked in camps the agency created. U.S. Housing Authority subsidies (later the Federal Public Housing Authority) funded segregated housing projects in the South, while some projects in the North were integrated.113 Nevertheless, some New Deal era legislation did provide a basis for challenges to Jim Crow. The 1935 Motor Carrier Act (also known as the Motor Vehicle Act), for example, prohibited discrimination on interstate buses. However, it was not until 1953 before a challenge under the act reached the ICC.114

The anti-discrimination feature of the Motor Vehicle Act of 1935 was indeed an aberration, when compared to the general patterns of segregation and discrimination in the New Deal years. A major incident, early in FDR’s third term, served to highlight the matter. By 1936, contralto Marian Anderson had achieved an international reputation as one of the greatest musical performers of the twentieth century. She had appeared in most of the larger and more prominent concert halls in the nation as well as many of Europe’s most famous halls. In 1936, she made a second triumphant tour of the Soviet Union. In many of her appearances throughout the country and the world, Anderson had broken down racial barriers. But her talents and fame did not win acceptance everywhere. Indeed, one instance of discrimination brought international notoriety and embarrassment to the New Deal administration of President Franklin D. Roosevelt.115

In 1939, a concert featuring Anderson, which had been originally scheduled at predominately black Howard University in Washington, was planned for Constitution Hall in the nation’s capitol. The hall was owned by the Daughters of the American Revolution (DAR). When the DAR refused, on account of race, to host the Anderson concert, a wave of protest erupted in the nation and elsewhere. First Lady Eleanor Roosevelt resigned her membership in the DAR in protest. She then, with the help of Secretary of the Interior, Harold L. Ickes, arranged for Anderson to perform at the Lincoln Memorial. On Easter Sunday, 1939, an interracial crowd of 75,000 persons gathered at the Memorial for an historic concert. The performance was one of “the most significant concerts…in American music history” and dealt a symbolic blow to Jim Crow. The DAR eventually lifted its racial ban at Constitution Hall.116

In the same year, in what may have been the nation’s first sit-in to protest the “separate but equal” treatment of African Americans, Samuel W. Tucker, a black attorney in Alexandria, Virginia led a group of five men who challenged Jim Crow in his city’s public library. Dressed in pinstripe suits

113 Franklin, From Slavery to Freedom, 534, 536, 537.
114 Section 216(d) of the act. The challenge went to the U.S. Supreme Court in 1955 in Keys v. Carolina Coach Co., 64 MCC 769.
116 Ibid.
and straw hats, the young men entered the library and asked for a library card. When the librarian refused, they seated themselves at separate tables. In a 1990 interview with the Washington Post, one of the sit-in members stated: “The whole setup was that we would each sit at a different table and read a book, and that we would remain silent the whole time so they couldn’t arrest us for disorderly conduct.” Following the arrest of the group for trespassing, Tucker filed suit to end segregation at the library. There was no final ruling in the case but the judge made clear that there were no restrictions against blacks attending the library. Rather than admit blacks, the city built a “separate-but-unequal” branch library. Tucker, whose civil rights record began with a refusal to give up his bus seat to a white person at age fourteen, went on to become one of Virginia’s most prominent civil rights attorneys.117

Breaching Jim Crow in 1941

The twentieth century to this point had seen segregated public carriers endorsed in the Fourteenth Amendment and the Interstate Commerce Act. The first major breach came in a case brought forth by a black Congressman, Arthur L. Mitchell. Mitchell, the son of former Alabama slaves, was educated at Tuskegee Institute, where he was Booker T. Washington’s office boy, and at Talladega College also in Alabama. After teaching in rural Alabama schools, Mitchell served as an assistant law clerk in Washington, D.C. He later moved to Chicago and became active in Republican politics. However, he switched to the Democratic Party, “with the shifting black party preference in the Depression years.” Although, he was the first black Democrat elected to the Congress, Mitchell “professed to be a moderate.” Nevertheless, he brought and sustained the long and costly suit that led to the end of Jim Crowism in Pullman railroad cars.118

On April 20, 1937, Mitchell took a train out of Chicago to Hot Springs, Arkansas. He held a first-class ticket. Early the next day as the train crossed into Arkansas, Mitchell was ordered out of the first class car by the train’s conductor, who informed him that under Arkansas’s Jim Crow law he could not ride in the Pullman coach. He was then placed in a second-class Jim Crow car.119 The black lawmaker sued the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad for $50,000 in damages. He also filed a complaint with the ICC, charging that he experienced “undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage,” contrary to federal law.120 The next year, ICC commissioners voted to dismiss his complaint by a one-vote margin, ruling that under the Interstate Commerce Act “not all discrimination was unlawful, only discrimination which was undue, unreasonable, and unjust.” The Commission went on to say that a “burden would have been placed on the railroad by requiring the provision of segregated first-class accommodations to the relatively small number of blacks seeking to travel first class.”121

Mitchell’s brief attacked segregation itself, and if the court found that view unacceptable, offered that blacks had a right to equal treatment under the Fourteenth Amendment, one that was not based on the level of demand as shown under the 1914 McCabe case where the court had emphasized that equal protection was a right belonging to the individual, not simply to blacks as a group. Because the ICC was a federal agency, the challenge was also directed at the United States. Rather than joining the ICC, the U.S. filed a brief in support of Mitchell’s claim; a move that indicated an 118 Hornsby, Chronology of African American History, 139, 146, see Nov. 7, 1934 and April 28, 1941.

119 Howard, Shifting Wind, 268-269.
120 Barnes, Journey from Jim Crow, 26-33. The case was Mitchell v. United States, 313 U.S. 80 (1941).
121 Howard, Shifting Wind, 269.
executive level “awareness concerning racial discrimination . . .and indicated the greater political and organizational pressure blacks were exerting on the federal government.” In opposition, ten southern states also aired their concerns in an amicus brief to preserve their segregation legislation.\textsuperscript{122}

Mitchell’s lawsuit finally reached the Supreme Court in 1941. The Supreme Court of the late 1930s had undergone a change in membership and doctrines as a result of President Roosevelt’s appointment of new members to replace four departed conservative Court members. The Court shifted from one that “thwarted programs for economic recovery” to a Court that “started to carve out a role for itself as a defender of individual liberties and civil rights.” On April 28, 1941, the Court unanimously ruled in Mitchell’s favor. The opinion did not challenge segregation directly; rather the Court held that Mitchell had been denied equal treatment with white passengers who occupied first-class accommodations. This decision made life easier for interstate black passengers riding in first-class cars, but not for the majority who traveled in second-class compartments.\textsuperscript{123}

Conclusion, African American, 1775-1941

Attitudes about race, ethnicity and nationality, which British colonists brought to America in the sixteenth and seventeenth century, helped to shape the conditions and circumstances under which African Americans would live in the American colonies and later in the United States of America. These attitudes helped to rationalize the enslavement of Africans and their degradation, even when “free.” Systematic discrimination was practiced against people of African origins in both word and deed.

This bias was gradually codified into both federal and state laws and into city ordinances. Major federal legislation, including the Civil Rights Act of 1866, the Civil Rights Act of 1875, and the Interstate Commerce Act of 1887 as well as the Thirteenth, Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments to the U. S. Constitution sought to grant equal standing under the law to African Americans. But the U.S. Supreme Court, especially in the Dred Scott decision of 1857, the Civil Rights Cases of 1883, and the Plessy v. Ferguson decision of 1896 sanctioned the “badge of inferiority” which the state and local governments had placed on black Americans. Some white Americans reinforced the proscribed “place” of blacks through extra-legal terror, such as lynchings and other violent attacks.

In addition to legal actions and public protests, African Americans and their allies from other racial and ethnic groups organized local, state, and national groups such as the NAACP and established alternative institutions in their own communities. Excluded or segregated in most public facilities, blacks opened businesses and other establishments for their own social and physical welfare as well as for amusement, entertainment, and lodging.

The growth of a black upper and middle class (particularly between the two world wars), black service in the wars, massive black migrations to the North, and increasing access to the elective franchise strengthened blacks’ resolve and ability to resist their “second-class” status in the United States. Thus, their efforts in the period during and after the Second World War, aided by the international attention to race brought by that war and the Cold War, led to a modern civil rights movement that would dismantle legally sanctioned segregation and discrimination in public accommodations within two decades.

\textsuperscript{122} Barnes, Journey from Jim Crow, 27-28.
\textsuperscript{123} Ibid., 25, 26-33, quote on 25.
SEGREGATION OF LATINA/OS IN THE 20TH CENTURY

Racial animus in the U.S. forced many Mexicans into segregated communities and made many potential immigrants think twice about crossing the border during the early years of the twentieth century. The latter began to change after 1911 with the Mexican Revolution when many immigrants came north, seeking work and refuge from the war. World War I also served as a catalyst for immigration since labor shortages occurred when the U.S. military recruited potential Anglo workers for service. U.S. employers, particularly in agricultural sectors, actively encouraged such migration and fought for reduced restrictions on Mexican immigration.

The upsurge in the Mexican population became especially apparent to the general U.S. society after World War I when economic downturns contributed to an upswing in xenophobia and anti-immigrant legislation. According to the U.S. Immigration Service, an estimated 459,000 Mexicans entered the United States between 1921 and 1930, more than double the number for the previous decade. This number almost certainly under represents the true amount of immigrants since many Mexicans avoided main border crossings such as El Paso, Texas; Nogales, Arizona; and Calexico, California where they were forced to pay an $8 head tax and a $10 visa fee. Although Mexican immigrants escaped inclusion in the restrictive immigration laws of 1921 and 1924 due to the lobbying efforts of their dependent employers, Mexicans had to endure ugly racist campaigns, especially when “cheap Mexican labor” was blamed for local unemployment or hard times. Additionally, newspapers and some politicians commented endlessly about “The Mexican Problem” of poverty, crime, illiteracy, and rates of disease without criticizing the low-wages and exploitive conditions provided by employers or the segregation and discrimination commonly practiced against them in U.S. society. The pressure to deal with “the problem” became so intense by the 1930s that a repatriation and deportation drive conducted by government officials sent 500,000 Mexican and Mexican Americans to Mexico. For the many Mexicans that remained in the U.S., continued harassment and discrimination characterized their experience during this decade of betrayal.

Segregation and the struggle to end it grew significantly between 1920 and 1940, particularly in the Southwest. Although it would take the crisis of World War II to mobilize interethnic coalitions and change the minds of mainstream society, Mexicans began to combat these practices virtually on their own during the 1920s and 1930s. These battles took place throughout the Southwest, including California, Arizona, Colorado, New Mexico, and Texas, though the historiography covering desegregation of public accommodations primarily favors California and Texas.

South/Southeast

While Jim Crow existed in the South and sections of the Midwest, its primary focus was to separate blacks from whites. For those Latinos with apparent African features such as Puerto Ricans, Cubans, and other Latin American immigrants to this region, legal segregation applied to them as well. Although the record is subsumed in larger histories of institutions and the African American civil rights movement, incidents involving Latinos have emerged in the historical record.

Historian Nancy Hewitt has documented the segregated world of Tampa, Florida, in which Afro-Cubans frequently experienced segregation. According to Hewitt, the process of segregating “white” and “black” Latinos was a complicated and imperfect process that took time and never quite drew the color line clearly. Because Cubans ranged from the very “dusky” to “white,” often some escaped Jim Crow. As well, owners of cigar-rolling factories that employed several Cubans placed profit over social engineering, and avoided confronting workers by maintaining racially integrated shop floors. Outside the plants, however, segregation in mutual aid societies and ethnic clubs reinforced the separateness of Afro-Cuban identity, and laid the foundations for interethnic collaboration among Caribbean and U.S.-born blacks.126

In Ybor City, the Latin section of Tampa, city officials enforced segregation of dark-skinned Cubans in theaters, churches, and schools as well as mutual aid societies. The regulations, rather than generating a mass movement among all Cubans, accentuated the class divisions within the community since it became easier for Anglos to categorize affluent Cubans as white and Spanish and working-class Afro-Cubans as Latin and “dusky.” Consequently, Cubans became a community divided along both color and class lines similar to the larger society.

Afro-Cubans and African Americans resented the segregation of public facilities such as streetcars in Tampa, Florida. In 1905, Tampa angered African American and Afro-Cuban patrons by extending Jim Crow to public transportation. An initial boycott of the Tampa Electric Company (TECO) streetcars was short-lived, and no concerted action by Latin and black patrons disrupted public transportation in Tampa. According to Hewitt, the threat from a large and militant Cuban population may have forced TECO to be more flexible in its application of Jim Crow in their cars, which lessened the sting of Jim Crow for blacks as well as Cubans. Additionally, “Latinos,” writes Hewitt, “seemed willing to abide by segregation in public accommodations in downtown Tampa, Ybor City, and West Tampa, as long as they could ignore the color line on shop floors and in union halls.” Consequently, African Americans, particularly African American women traveling to and from work as domestic servants, engaged in spontaneous and individual protests against abusive, white, streetcar conductors.127

Ironically, when elite Latin civic leaders did challenge Jim Crow, they did so in the defense of their whiteness. In August 1915, the owners of a popular St. Petersburg beach and resort, Passe-á-Grille, posted a sign reading “No Cubans Allowed.” The segregation angered the Cuban consul in Tampa, Ralph M. Ybor, who first complained to local authorities, and then took his case to Washington, D.C. Ybor drew on Reconstruction-era legislation by claiming that the Constitution protected Cubans from segregation based on race or color even though Cubans themselves had discriminated against blacks and dark-skinned Latins in Cuban-owned businesses in Florida. Ybor eventually won his suit, and the offending sign was removed.128

Southern California

Scholar/activist Carey McWilliams documented the pervasive segregation Mexican people experienced in Southern California during the first half of the twentieth century. Evoking the segregated “Jim Crow” conditions of blacks in the U.S. South, McWilliams labeled the living

127 Ibid., 147.
128 Ibid., 218-219.
quarters of Mexicans “jim-towns.” “From Santa Barbara to San Diego,” he wrote, “one can find these jim-towns, with their clusters of bizarre shacks, usually located in an out-of-the-way place on the outskirts of an established citrus-belt town.”129 White city officials encouraged Mexican families to live outside of white settlements separated by either train tracks or highways, thus giving rise to the popular expression that Mexicans lived on the “other side of the tracks.”

The strict separation of Mexicans and whites carried over into public spaces in downtown commercial districts. According to McWilliams, “While the towns deny that they practice segregation, nevertheless, segregation is the rule.”130 In addition to placing Mexican children in separate schools, city officials restricted Mexican use of swimming pools to either a “Mexican Day” or “International Day,” which fell on the day of cleaning or the day before. Additionally, McWilliams observed, “[Mexicans] occupy the balcony seats in motion-picture theaters, and frequent separate places of amusement.” Indeed, McWilliams found the segregation so thorough that he characterized the system as “perfectly designed to insulate workers from employers in every walk of life, from the cradle to the grave, from the church to the saloon.”131 These conditions predominated in other agricultural regions of the Southwest, including Colorado where Mexican beet workers were routinely denied service at restaurants.132

In the regions of Southern California where Mexicans served as the primary, but not exclusive group harvesting citrus, white ranch owners segregated Mexican, Asian, and white workers. For example, prior to the 1920s in the citrus town of Upland, citrus growers employed Mexican, Japanese, and Sikh workers. According to one former Mexican worker, Baudelio Sandoval, local rancher Godfrey Andreas segregated employees by race in residential camps: Japanese lived in a camp on 18th Street, Mexicans on 17th Street, and Sikhs (commonly misnamed “Hindu”) on 14th Street. Outside of the camps, Mexican, Asian, and Sikh laborers found their civil rights and basic movements restricted by white city officials and business owners. In Upland, racial minorities were restricted from shopping anywhere but the market owned by Andreas’s friend, Mr. Klindt, and many storeowners posted signs reading “Just-White-Trade-Only.”

Residents of Upland and Ontario traveled by trolley from the citrus-heights down to the town center.
As the trolley moved down the hill, Japanese at 18th Street, Mexicans at 17th Street, and Sikhs at 14th Street could catch a ride in specially segregated cars monitored by local police. Andreas instructed officers to let his workers out at only two places: either the downtown stop near Klindt’s store, or their designated residential camps. After making their purchases, police and shopkeepers escorted Mexican, Japanese, and Sikh patrons back to the trolley and transported them directly to their respective camps. In neighboring citrus towns such as Ontario and LaVerne, Mexican residents remember that they shopped with fewer restrictions, but many recalled being peppered by white residents with racial epithets like “dirty greasers” and “spik.” Former citrus worker Nick Fuentes 129 Carey McWilliams, Southern California Country: An Island in the Land (Salt Lake City, UT: Gibbs-Smith Publisher,

130 Ibid., 218-219.
131 Ibid., 219.
132 Sarah Deutsch, No Separate Refuge: Culture, Class, and Gender on an Anglo-Hispanic Frontier in the American County filed a civil rights case in 1927 against Greeley restaurant proprietors who ejected him on the grounds that he was a Mexican.”
recalled that in LaVerne, prior to World War II, Mexicans were expected to step off the sidewalk and into the street when whites approached.133

Segregation was also sometimes enforced through intimidation. During the 1920s, in southern California towns from Santa Paula in Ventura County to Ontario in San Bernardino County, Ku Klux Klan orders publicly asserted their vision of segregated society. Citrus belt Klaverns (KKK orders) often held high profile, public ceremonies (called Klonklaves) and parades in which klanspeople burned crosses and prominently displayed placards reading “White Supremacy.” At a Klonklave in Ontario, California on September 8, 1924, the KKK initiated 150 new candidates to the local order. According to the newspaper reports, “Mounted klansmen, and several platoons of robed men and women” funneled into the local high school football stadium where a “huge fiery cross…visible from Upland to Ontario’s business district” blazed until the midnight hour.134

“New” Klan scholars have argued that the KKK of the 1920s did not bother ethnoracial minorities and concentrated most of their attention on enforcing temperance laws.135 The goal of sobriety and social control of Mexican residents, however, were not mutually exclusive. Mexican distillers in their segregated communities (colonias) ran cantinas like “the salon” in Arbol Verde where Mexican men and an occasional white patron purchased home-brewed alcohol and hard liquor. This informal economy became an important source of survival for some unemployed men and single mothers who could support their families on their profits. In the Mexican colonia in La Verne, for example, resident Nick Fuentes remembered drinking pulque, syrupy Mexican liquor, at the local pool hall. Separated from the white community, Mexican business owners could violate temperance laws with relative impunity, but this provoked acts of vigilantism by the local KKK.

According to one Mexican American eyewitness, the Klan in Ontario used intimidation to enforce residential segregation. Local resident Victor Murillo Ruiz remembered that in 1929 his father inquired about buying a house located outside the traditional Mexican colonia. When a white neighbor heard of his plans, he threatened Ruiz’s brother, “If you’re thinking of buying that house, you tell your dad he may buy it, but that house is going to be burned down the next day.” Later, Ruiz recalled, the Klan terrorized his family: “I looked through the windows and I saw three cars with people with white hoods in them. . . . I can remember three men standing on the running board [holding on to] the car. . . . The people on the outside had torches. . . . I would look at them and hide; I thought they were ghosts. My mother . . . pulled me away from the window. She said, “Don’t do that. Those people don’t like for you to look at them.” Ultimately, the Ruiz family chose not to purchase the house.136

Typically, citrus belt Klan orders of the 1920s committed few if any acts of physical violence. Instead, most Klaverns relied on intimidation through impressive public parades and drive-by threats like the one experienced by the Ruiz family. Public KKK rituals and night-riding had a tremendous psychological impact on participants, viewers, and victims. For whites, Klan rallies affirmed a general belief in White Anglo-Saxon Protestant (WASP) exceptionalism, while for those who fell outside the fold of Klan beliefs, namely Mexicans, Jews, and Catholics, parades and psychological terror warned against challenging the social order. The popularity of the Klan represented the most extreme example of white supremacy in Southern California.

Texas

Historian David Montejano documents similar forms of discrimination in Texas. Labeling the period spanning from 1920 to 1940 an era of segregation, Montejano argues that three fundamental forces drove the separation of Mexicans and whites (or “Anglos”) in Texas. First, Anglo farmers’ needs for an organized and disciplined labor force drove them to exercise violence, coercion, and legal power over Mexicans, whom they saw as inferior, foreign and/or a defeated people. Second, in contrast to the master-servant bond of plantations in the South, the temporary impersonal contracts signed between Mexican workers and Anglo employers meant that relations between the two were generally anonymous, formal affairs. In short, Anglos rubbed shoulders with Mexicans only at the point of production. Finally, the popularity of “race-thinking” informed many Anglos’ opinions of Mexicans. Chicano historian, Neil Foley, argues that popular ideas and “scientific” theories of white superiority among white Texans helped determine all forms of segregation in Texas during this period.

Mexican Texans suffered the same types of indignities as many Mexicans living in California during this period. The significant presence of African Americans in Texas, however, added yet another tier to this racial hierarchy. For example, in the Texas county of San Patricio, the owners of the Taft Ranch constructed a hospital in 1910 with separate structures for “Anglo-Americans, Latin Americans, and Negroes.” At Christmas time, each group received handouts of candy, but each group collected their gifts in separate places. Along the coastal plains in Kingsville, while Mexicans worked on Anglo ranches, ranch owners constructed separate townships for Mexicans and Anglos. Segregated living spaces often translated into segregated shopping districts. For example, in South Texas towns like Kleberg, McAllen, and Weslaco, Mexicans were restricted to shopping in “their own dry goods stores, grocery stores, meat markets, tailor shops and a number of other shops and businesses.”

In counties where Mexicans and Anglos came into social contact more frequently, rules of social etiquette enforced notions of Anglo superiority. In Winter Gardens, Texas, Anglos expected Mexicans to maintain “a deferential body posture and respectful voice tone” whenever in the presence of Anglos, while drugstores, restaurants, retail stores, and banks routinely served Mexicans only after catering to Anglo patrons first. Drawn from economist Paul Taylor’s 1930 study of Mexican laborers in South Texas, David Montejano offered the following description of the segregated world of Winter Gardens, Texas: “Public buildings were seen as ‘Anglo territories;’ Mexican women were ‘only supposed to shop on the Anglo side of town on Saturdays, preferably during the early hours when Anglos were not shopping;’ Mexicans were allowed only counter and carry-out service at Anglo cafés; and all Mexicans were expected to be back in Mexican town by sunset.” Similar to the conditions in many California towns, Taylor found the segregation to be so complete that, in effect, “there was an Anglo world and a Mexicano world” that met only when they entered the “dusty fields” to work.140

By the 1930s and 1940s, people of Mexican origin were legally excluded from public facilities reserved for whites more as a matter of habit than of law throughout the Southwest, though courts occasionally weighed in to legally reinforce discrimination against Mexicans. In Lueras v. Town of Lafayette (1937) and Terrell Wells Swimming Pool v. Rodríguez (1944), the courts determined that Mexicans were not white and therefore not entitled to use public facilities. Although the two Mexicans in the cases argued that they were of Spanish descent, their dark skin indicated that they were racially mixed, and thus they lost the trials. According to Anthropologist Martha Menchaca, “in Texas a study conducted by the Inter-American Committee in 1943 found that over 117 towns in Texas practiced social segregation against Mexicans and most passed de jure segregation laws.” While technically Mexicans were not singled out as a non-white minority, the act of identifying them as “Indian” and therefore non-white made them subject to such systematic discrimination.141 As a result, Mexicans were forced to use separate bathrooms and drinking fountains and sit in separate sections of restaurants and theaters.

These conditions, however, did not go unchallenged. In the period leading up to and through World War II, Mexican Americans, collectively and individually, challenged segregation in a variety of ways. Occasionally they put diplomatic pressure on municipal, state, and federal government through established organizations within Mexican American communities and coalition politics with sympathetic whites. The courts also became an avenue for contesting discriminatory treatment. In most cases, Mexican Americans organized local and regional boycotts and protest movements and attempted to mobilize public sentiment against segregation through the local media.

140 Ibid., 168.
PART THREE, 1941-1954
World War II and the Double V Campaign

World War II highlighted African American demands for the elimination of racial segregation. More than twenty years earlier during the First World War, African Americans had put aside their grievances and closed ranks behind the United States government, only to experience bitter disappointment in the wave of postwar racism and xenophobia that continued to deny them equality. Having learned from this bitter experience, between 1941 and 1945 blacks insisted on pressing their struggle for first-class citizenship. Encouraged by President Franklin D. Roosevelt’s New Deal policies that had brought them a measure of economic and political inclusion in the 1930s, African Americans forged the wartime ideology against Nazi theories of racial superiority into a potent weapon to attack racial inequality in the United States.

Black leaders waged a “Double V Campaign” to combat fascism abroad as well as white supremacy at home. A. Philip Randolph, the black labor leader who headed the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, pointed the way in June, 1941 when he threatened to lead 100,000 African Americans in a March on Washington to protest employment discrimination and segregation in the military. Fearing negative publicity as he prepared the country for war, President Roosevelt gave in partially and averted the threatened mass demonstration. He set up the Fair Employment Practice Committee (FEPC) to investigate job bias, but held off from desegregating the armed forces. Nevertheless, for the first time in the twentieth century, the federal government mobilized its power behind civil rights.

The Congress of Racial Equality

Although Randolph did not carry out the march, other civil rights activists engaged in protests that directly challenged Jim Crow policies at the local level. Differing from Randolph’s projected March on Washington, which was all-black, an interracial group of fifty women and men, about half black and half white, formed in Chicago in 1942 the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE). Many of its charter members had been active in Christian pacifist groups, such as the Fellowship of Reconciliation (FOR), which were also interested in the pursuit of racial justice. The head of FOR, A. J. Muste, a former Marxist-Leninist labor organizer who had abandoned communism but not revolution, albeit a peaceful variety, had a profound influence on one of the founders of CORE, James Farmer. A black Texan who held a Bachelor of Divinity degree from Howard University, Farmer expressed the Christian sentiments dominating the group and those buttressing its willingness to confront directly the evils of segregation: “The Blessed Community and the Family of Christ are rent asunder by the evil practice of apartheid in America, which will not end until the decent and religious people of the land will it so.” Consequently, CORE members believed in winning over 142 The author, Steven F. Lawson, professor of history at Rutgers University, wishes to acknowledge the assistance of Danielle McGuire in researching the context for the desegregation of public accommodations for African Americans in the post WWII period.

---

their oppressors through goodwill, negotiation, and love. They did not seek to demonize their opponents, but intended to give them ample opportunity to redeem themselves by abandoning segregation.

World War II posed a challenge to CORE’s philosophy of moral suasion and Christian love. While the civil rights movement would come mainly to focus on Jim Crow in the South, many of its early efforts targeted segregation in the North and West. Civil rights advocates in the region had solid legal ground upon which to base their protests. In the 1940s, eighteen northern and western states had laws on their books that prohibited discrimination in public accommodations. Fourteen of them banned discrimination specifically on racial grounds. In general, these anti-bias codes applied to restaurants, hotels, public conveyances, educational institutions, parks, libraries, and other public places. The most extensive coverage was found in Illinois, New Jersey, New York, and Pennsylvania.¹⁴⁶

Despite these civil rights statutes, segregation in public accommodations existed above the Mason-Dixon Line, and racial skirmishes intensified during the war. The wartime migration of blacks and whites from the South in search of jobs in the industrial North exacerbated racial tensions in public transportation, recreational facilities, and housing, which would explode in approximately 242 race riots in 48 cities in 1943. In this increasingly hostile environment, CORE first went to work in Chicago. In 1942, an interracial group led by James Farmer tried to purchase tickets to a popular Windy City establishment, the White City Roller Rink. True to its name, the business sold tickets to Farmer’s white companions but not to him. After trying to reason with the management, Farmer pressed charges against the facility, but the courts dismissed the case.¹⁴⁷ Combining Christian pacifist commitment to bearing moral witness against moral injustice with the tactics of organized labor in conducting sit-down strikes against intransigent capitalists in the 1930s, CORE went on the offensive to remove the indignities of segregation in public accommodations.

CORE proceeded to attack several Chicago restaurants, which despite Illinois’ civil rights law practiced racial discrimination. CORE targeted two eateries, Jack Spratt and Stoner’s. Negotiations and a campaign of public education through leafleting brought no results, and in May 1943, CORE launched a sit-in at Jack Spratt’s. Twenty-one of its members, black and white, refused to leave the premises when the black contingent failed to receive service. After the police refused to comply with the store’s wishes to evict the protesters, the demonstrators successfully placed their orders. The following month, a sit-in at Stoner’s produced similar results. Thus, Farmer felt vindicated in the “sit-in as the successful culmination of a long campaign to reach the heart of the restaurant owner with the truth.”¹⁴⁸

Howard University Sit-Ins

CORE partisans were not the only ones to devise innovative tactics for protest. In Washington, D.C., students at Howard University conducted their own sit-ins against racial discrimination in restaurants. In January 1943, shortly before the CORE protests in Chicago, three undergraduate ¹⁴⁶ Pauli Murray, States’ Laws on Race and Color (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1997). The fourteen states outlawing discrimination based on race were: Connecticut, California, Colorado, Indiana, Kansas, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, New Jersey, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Washington, and Wisconsin. The other four states that prohibited discrimination on more general grounds were: Nebraska, Illinois, Iowa, and Rhode Island.

---

¹⁴⁷ Farmer, Lay Bare, 97-99.

¹⁴⁸ Meier and Rudwick, CORE, 13-14, quote on 14; Farmer, ibid., 106-08.
women, Ruth Powell, Marianne Musgrave, and Juanita Morrow, were refused service at the counter of a United Cigar store. After the police instructed the waitress to serve the trio, she overcharged them for cups of hot chocolate. They insisted on paying only the regular amount, which then led the police to make a turnabout and arrest them for refusing to pay the specified bill. Sparked by this action, Howard students formed a Civil Rights Committee under the auspices of the college chapter of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). It zeroed in on restaurants in the area that surrounded campus. Pauli Murray, a student from North Carolina attending Howard Law School, served as advisor to the group, and on April 17, student volunteers marched to the Little Palace Cafeteria on Fourteenth and U Streets, N.W. Teams of three entered the facility and were rebuffed. While they sat at the tables and read their textbooks, others picketed outside hoisting posters with slogans such as “We Die Together—Why Can’t We Eat Together?” The owner closed the cafeteria after the police refused to arrest the peaceful demonstrators. After two more days of protest, the restaurant capitulated, and African Americans could eat a meal alongside whites.

The following year, again led by Murray and Powell, Howard students resumed their desegregation drive against a major Washington, D.C. cafeteria chain—John R. Thompson. They chose the restaurant at Eleventh Street and Pennsylvania Avenue, N.W., because it was moderately priced, opened twenty-four hours, and conveniently located for black government workers who were employed nearby. On Saturday, April 22, 1944, groups of black and white students entered the cafeteria and remained seated at tables after they were denied service. Outside, students walked a picket line. The demonstration received a big boost when six black soldiers came into the cafeteria and joined the students seated in protest. Following a four-hour standoff and a sharp drop in business, the manager of Thompson’s, after consulting with corporate headquarters in Chicago, instructed his staff to wait on the black customers. However, the students’ joy proved short-lived. A few days after this initial victory, Thompson’s barred a Howard student from eating. Before the civil rights forces could spring into action, Howard’s president, Mordecai Johnson, issued a directive to the NAACP chapter members “to desist from its program of direct action in the City of Washington.” Funded by Congress, Howard administrators feared that hostile lawmakers, especially from the South, would retaliate and cut the university’s appropriations if the demonstrations persisted.

The students’ campaign, however, eventually bore fruit. At the time of the sit-ins, Pauli Murray discovered an old District of Columbia statute from 1872 that prohibited racial discrimination by restaurants, ice-cream parlors, soda fountains, hotels, barbershops, and bathing establishments. In subsequent codifications of local statutes, this anti-discrimination law had been omitted but not repealed. Murray suggested bringing a court case based on this long-forgotten, Reconstruction-Era provision, but she did not find any backing at the time. Nevertheless, nine years later in 1953, the Supreme Court ruled that the 1872 law was still in effect to protect the rights of African Americans to obtain equal access to public accommodations. The suit had been initiated by Mary Church Terrell, the nonagenarian founder of the National Association of Colored Women, against Thompson’s Cafeteria for its ongoing policy of excluding blacks from dining.

World War II Racial Violence

Although World War II provided fertile ground for the development of innovative tactics to tear down barriers to racial equality, it also heightened tensions between blacks and whites over the use of contested public spaces. Conflicts emerged from the demographic shifts produced by the war. Rural black and white southerners migrated to southern and northern cities in search of job openings resulting from booming wartime production and the enlistment of men into the military. This huge influx of migrants placed a severe strain on public facilities and led to frequent breaches in customary racial practices. Black soldiers stationed in the South encountered hostility as they sought out places to eat and relax. In the North, black workers clashed with whites over housing and public entertainment. The situation reached a boiling point in 1943 with the outbreak of over 240 racial disturbances in 47 cities throughout the country. The most severe one occurred in Detroit on June 20th. In a city swollen with a million wartime black and white transplants, trouble erupted at the Belle Island recreation park, located near the black neighborhood of Paradise Valley. On a day when 100,000 people had attended the amusement facility, sporadic fights broke out between white and black youths. Rumors spread of rapes and killings, which precipitated a full-scale race riot. Blacks attacked whites and whites pulled blacks off trolley cars and beat them. Before it was all over, 34 people were killed, 700 injured, $200 million in property damaged, and President Roosevelt had to dispatch federal troops to restore calm.152

African Americans in the West

African-American migrants also encountered racial difficulties in the West, where they had traveled outside of the South in search of wartime jobs in aircraft factories and shipyards. Furthermore, many blacks were stationed there in military camps. The black population of the region swelled during the 1940s by 33 percent or some 443,000 people. Most of the migrants congregated in California, which absorbed about 75 percent of the increased number of minority residents. The San Francisco Bay area alone saw the size of its black population leap 798 percent; Los Angeles followed with 168 percent. Seattle, Washington and Portland, Oregon experienced huge growth as well. Throughout the West Coast blacks encountered employment discrimination and segregated housing. Ironically, African Americans took up residence in the homes of Japanese Americans, who had been relocated during the war, and remained in them once peace returned. Blacks and Latinos managed generally to coexist peacefully, but violence in crowded cities did erupt between African Americans and whites. Fights broke out between black and white soldiers in Seattle and San Luis Obispo, California. In 1943 interracial confrontations occurred in Portland and Los Angeles shipyards, and in the following year black civilians and white sailors brawled in Oakland.153

Within these surroundings, African Americans encountered discrimination in public accommodations. Although buses and theatres were not segregated, restaurants and other establishments did exclude blacks, sometimes in subtle ways. A woman who migrated from Pine Bluff, Arkansas to Oakland remembered: “They didn’t have ‘No Colored’ signs or anything like that, but they had ways of telling you they didn’t want you.” Her memory may have been a bit faulty because in 1946, the Oakland Institute on Human Relations reported that many businesses in the city displayed signs reading “We Refuse Service to Negroes” and documented instances of black patrons unable to obtain service in East Bay hotels, bars, and restaurants. The Alameda branch of the NAACP, which included Oakland and Berkeley, brought litigation against businesses that denied access to black customers. Even those African Americans who managed to have a meal in a restaurant found themselves subject to rude treatment by the staff.154 Despite these frustrations, the greatest problems black migrants along the West Coast faced concerned jobs, housing and treatment by the police more than public accommodations.

Transportation

Elsewhere, perhaps the major source of daily frustration for African Americans with respect to public accommodations occurred in transportation. In the South, blacks going to work routinely faced segregation on buses. Subject to rude treatment by bus drivers, forced to pay full fare and enter vehicles by the back door, and required to sit behind an accordion-like line of demarcation that moved back and forth to keep the races separated, black southerners sometimes lashed out against white passengers with rude behavior to upset them. Even the most genteel person could lose patience, refuse to obey the rules, and find herself removed from the bus, as first happened to Rosa Parks in Montgomery, Alabama during the war. In November 1943, she paid her fare but then boarded the bus in the front instead of the rear as customary. The driver, James F. Blake, belligerently ordered her off the bus and told her to reenter through the back door. Although Parks refused, she did decide to leave the bus on her own accord, thus avoiding the possibility of violence against her and arrest.155 She would encounter difficulties on and off for another decade until on December 1, 1955, when she refused to abide the segregation law and sparked the Montgomery Bus Boycott. Train travel either within or outside the state was no better, as blacks endured separate treatment that was in no way equal, despite paying the same fare as did whites. Given the discomfort African Americans experienced traveling to and from work or visiting their relatives, the desegregation of public transportation became a primary target for black liberation efforts.

The Protest of Lieutenant Jackie Robinson

As mentioned earlier, the war placed great pressure on local buses to accommodate the rising number of black and white passengers. One of the most noteworthy examples of pervasive discrimination involved Jackie Robinson, an All-American athlete from California and a commissioned officer in the Army stationed at Ft. Hood, Texas. On January 6, 1944, Lieutenant Robinson boarded a bus leaving camp and refused to heed the driver’s warning to “get to the back of the bus where the colored people belong.” Like other non-southerners who had not experienced segregation in public transportation back home, Robinson stood his ground. Arrested by the military police, the future Hall of Fame baseball player faced a court martial but was acquitted.156 The verdict, however, had little impact outside military posts, as local municipal buses continued to enforce Jim Crow seating.

Tuskegee Airmen

As a soldier, Robinson did not act alone in challenging racial discrimination in the armed forces. On the eve of America’s entry into the war, civil rights groups such as the NAACP and the National Urban League, along with the Negro press and black college officials, campaigned to break down the barriers that kept the Army Air Corps from accepting black pilots. The War Department believed blacks incapable of flying aircraft. One report claimed that the “colored race does not have the technical nor the flying background for the creation of a bombardment-type unit.” Nevertheless, persistent pressure and the negative publicity tarnishing the nation’s democratic war aims led the War Department in 1941 to agree to train African-American pilots. The black fighter squadron remained segregated from white pilots, prompting criticism from the NAACP and the black press, which favored the cessation of racial criteria in the military. The Pittsburgh Courier blasted the Jim Crow policy as “a citadel to the theory that there can be segregation without discrimination.” Yet by the end of the war, the exploits of the Tuskegee Airmen had made African Americans swell with pride. Stationed at Tuskegee Army Airfield in Alabama, on the grounds of an abandoned graveyard, black pilots eventually took to the skies over Europe and proved their skills in fighting the Nazis.

However, both overseas and at home, the Tuskegee Airmen battled racial discrimination. They fought against the military command’s thinking that they could not make talented fighter pilots in combat, and they challenged segregated facilities on military posts in the United States. At the Tuskegee training center, the airmen conducted a successful sit-in protest to desegregate accommodations on the base. In response, Colonel Noel F. Parish discarded segregated signs, invited popular entertainers to lift the troop’s morale, and desegregated the mess hall. At other military posts black pilots were segregated in the mess halls and movie theatres, while German prisoners of war who were quartered at the camps took seats in the “whites only” areas of these accommodations, an outrage black soldiers protested. Indeed, enemy prisoners of war could attend shows, movies, and dances, sponsored by the USO and local Chambers of Commerce, which were barred to black soldiers. The situation was much the same once the soldiers left the military posts. In one highly charged incident, black airmen taking leave from Walterboro Army Air Field in South Carolina stopped to eat in a racially restricted café in nearby Fairfax, and were denied service. Brimming with anger, they told the white owner to “go to Hell,” brandished their service revolvers, and left the restaurant shouting the mock salute, “Heil Hitler.” Slightly more successful, in November 1944, Walterboro airmen, spending a leave in Washington D.C., integrated the District of Columbia’s airport cafeteria after having been first turned away. They may have received service out of deference to their military uniforms, because the airport accommodations resumed segregation once the war ended.

157 The author wishes to acknowledge and thank Todd Moye for suggesting information relating to the Tuskegee Airmen. For this quote see Lynn Homan and Thomas Reilly, Black Knights: The Story of Tuskegee Airmen (Gretna, LA.: Pelican Publishing, 2001), 179.
159 Homan and Reilly, Black Knights, 72, 77.
Protests also surfaced at Selfridge Field just outside of Detroit. On January 1, 1944, black officers teamed in groups of three in intervals throughout the day attempted to integrate the racially restricted officer’s club. Although one group gained admission, the soldiers were soon ordered to leave by the base commander. The protest resumed the next day, but the club remained barred to blacks. One of the leaders of the challenge was Lieutenant Milton Henry from Philadelphia, who had previous confrontations with segregation. In the spring of 1942, Henry had a run-in with a Montgomery, Alabama bus driver when he refused his order to sit in the rear of the vehicle. Henry demanded his nickel fare back and punched the driver in the mouth. The driver pulled out a gun, and the two began a struggle that spilled out onto the street. Henry managed to escape, but was sent to the military stockade for a brief period. A year later, he was stationed at Selfridge and helped plan the organized protests. The persistent Henry lodged a complaint with the War Department, which resulted in an investigation of racial discrimination at the air field, under the direction of General Benjamin O. Davis, the military’s highest ranking African-American officer. The report confirmed the protesters’ charges, and the War Department ordered a reprimand for Selfridge’s commander. However, Henry faced reprisals. In 1944, Air Force officials prosecuted him for insubordination on an incident unrelated to the officer’s club demonstration. He was found guilty and discharged from the Army on August 10.

An even more serious brouhaha occurred in April 1945, when Colonel Robert Selway ordered that the officer’s club at Freeman Field in Seymour, Indiana remain segregated. The policy sparked a challenge from members of the 477th Bombardment Group who were stationed there. Previously, black soldiers had staged a protest when Selway insisted on separating the races in the base’s movie theatre. Black airmen and their white sympathizers initiated “Operation Checkboard,” and when the lights went down, the soldiers switched seats so that they were sitting next to each other under cover of darkness. On April 5, 1945, several groups of black officers defied Selway’s Jim Crow regulations and proceeded to enter the “whites-only” Club Number Two. In turn, the colonel had them arrested and proceeded to court-martial over one hundred African-American officers. The beleaguered airmen wired the War Department that the continuation of segregation “can hardly be reconciled with the world wide struggle for freedom for which we are asked and are willing to lay down our lives.”

By this point in the war, the Army high brass, under pressure from the NAACP and the black press, had grown less tolerant of overt racial discrimination, especially within its officers’ corps, and set nearly all the accused airmen free. Nevertheless, General Frank O. Hunter, the commander of the First Air Force and a Georgia native who supported Jim Crow, convinced the War Department to approve the court-martials of three of the protesters, Lieutenant Robert Terry, Lieutenant Shirley Clinton, and Lieutenant Marsden Thompson. The military panels acquitted Clinton and Marsden, but found Terry guilty; however, he received a light fine. At the same time, the Army punished Colonel Selway and relieved him from command of Freeman Field. In a few years, President Harry Truman would issue an executive order leading to the desegregation of the armed forces, and by the end of the next war in Korea in 1953, blacks and whites had fought, ate, played, and died side by side. Problems of equal treatment in the military remained and racial discrimination around military bases in the South persisted, but together with Major League Baseball, the armed forces led the way in toppling Jim Crow in the immediate postwar period.

162 Scott and Womack, Sr., Double V, 195-196, 200, 203-209.
163 Honan and Reilly, Black Knights, 192 (for the quote), 186 on “Operation Checkboard.” One of the airmen arrested as a result of the protests and then exonerated was Coleman Young, who in 1973 was elected the first African-American mayor of Detroit. Scott and Womack, Sr., Double V, 232.
164 Scott and Womack, Sr., Double V, 231-248.
The Irene Morgan Case

In the meantime, given the importance of the transportation problem for black civilians as well as military personnel, the NAACP prepared a concerted attack against segregation. Its attorneys sought to prove that state segregation laws requiring separate facilities imposed an unconstitutional hardship on interstate commerce. A golden opportunity arose on July 16, 1944 when Irene Morgan of Baltimore, Maryland was returning home from Virginia aboard a Greyhound Bus. At Saluda, Virginia, the bus driver ordered Morgan to give up her seat in the next to last row of the vehicle to a white couple. Morgan refused because the back row of the bus was filled, and she would have to stand. The driver called the police and had her arrested. Tried in Middlesex County Court, she was found guilty of violating Virginia’s segregation ordinances and fined $10 and court costs.165

Under the direction of Spottswood Robinson, III, a Virginia lawyer for the NAACP and Thurgood Marshall, chief counsel of the national organization, Morgan petitioned the U.S. Supreme Court to set aside her conviction after the Virginia Supreme Court refused to do so. Over the previous decade, the high tribunal had ruled in favor of black plaintiffs in several important cases expanding racial equality. The most recent had been in April 1944, when the justices outlawed the Democratic white primary used in the South to prevent African Americans from voting in the most important election in the region. Following this trend, on June 3, 1946, the court declared that Virginia’s segregation law interfered with Morgan’s freedom to travel across state lines.166

The Supreme Court soon showed that it was really more sensitive to the rights of minorities than to concerns over regulating interstate commerce. On June 21, 1945, a young black woman from Michigan, Sarah E. Ray, accompanied several white girl friends to take a fifteen-mile boat ride from Detroit to Bob-Lo Island in Ontario, Canada. Bob-Lo Excursion Company, which ran the ferry service, excluded blacks and thereby prevented Ray from boarding. She sued the company, and a municipal court in Detroit ruled in her favor, finding that the ferry service had violated Michigan’s civil rights statute against racial discrimination in public accommodations. The company appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court, contending that the state law imposed an unconstitutional burden on interstate commerce by requiring integration and thus no less unlawful as what Virginia had done by enforcing segregation. Instead, on February 2, 1948, the high bench strained to find a way to distinguish its Morgan opinion. Holding that Michigan’s civil rights statute had not hampered interstate or in this case foreign commerce, the justices argued that the short boat ride was in effect a local trip on the fringes of Detroit.167

The First Freedom Rides

Despite the Supreme Court rulings, southern transportation remained segregated. Instead of basing their Jim Crow requirements on state laws, bus companies adopted their own private regulations to ensure segregated seating. This became perfectly clear as CORE sought to test whether in light of the Morgan decision blacks could ride unfettered on buses traveling into the South. In 1947, along with FOR, CORE sponsored teams of integrated riders to see if they could travel unmolested through Virginia, North Carolina, Tennessee, and Kentucky. George Houser, the executive secretary of CORE had come up with the idea along with Bayard Rustin, a black conscientious objector from West Chester, Pennsylvania, who had served a prison term for refusing to cooperate with the draft during World War II. Highlighting the cooperation between the two groups, Houser and Rustin served as co-secretaries of the Racial-Industrial Department of FOR and hatched the plan for the bus trip. 168 They believed that they had the greatest chance of success in these rim states of the Upper South. Embarking from Washington, D.C. on April 9, on what they called the Journey of Reconciliation, eight blacks and eight whites divided into two groups and rode Greyhound and Trailways buses into Dixie. They first encountered trouble as the buses headed from Virginia into North Carolina. A driver asked Bayard Rustin, one of the black passengers, to vacate his seat in the front of the bus and move to the rear. Rustin, an advocate of Gandhian nonviolence and a conscientious objector who had served in prison during World War II, politely refused to comply.

---

165 Barnes, Journey from Jim Crow, 45.

The driver backed off, and the journey continued uneventfully until the buses rolled into Chapel Hill, North Carolina, a usually quiet and progressive college town. Here four of the passengers, including Rustin and James Peck, a white man, were arrested for failing to move into designated segregated sections on the bus. As they departed from the bus into the station, violence flared as a group of taxi drivers attacked Peck. The arrested travelers posted bail and took refuge at the home of the Reverend Charles Jones, a white Presbyterian minister with ties to FOR. After receiving threatening phone calls at his house, the group resumed its trip into Tennessee, Kentucky, and back through North Carolina and Virginia. Drivers insisted on segregated seating, but the biracial passengers refused to cooperate. Although no further violence broke out, a total of twelve riders were taken into custody for not complying with segregation orders. On April 23, the journey ended as both a testimony to the interracial travelers’ courage and the unwillingness of southern transportation authorities to obey the Morgan ruling. Indeed, little had changed and the following year, Rustin and one of his white companions were convicted of violating North Carolina’s segregation law and served twenty-two days on a prison chain gang.169

The Elmer Henderson Case

Clearly the rules affecting interstate and intrastate travel ran along distinct tracks, but on occasion they crossed. The Pennsylvania Railroad operated trains from New York City to Washington D.C. on a segregated basis in anticipation of Jim Crow restrictions as trains moved southward. However, in 1949, CORE protested this arrangement with the New York State Commission Against Discrimination, which declared that the railroad’s action ran afoul of the state’s civil rights acts. Consequently, the railroad ceased separating passengers on its route to the nation’s capital, but once in D.C. the southern lines that took over resumed segregation.170

In spite of the reality of persistent discrimination, African Americans continued to win cases in the courts. The next major victory stemmed from events dating back to World War II. On May 17, 1942, Elmer Henderson, a field representative for the FEPC, boarded a Southern Railroad train from Washington D.C. en route to Birmingham, Alabama to participate in a committee hearing. Henderson walked into the dining car to eat and was prepared to take his seat behind a curtain used to separate black and white patrons. However, because the car was overcrowded, whites had already occupied the two tables behind the Jim Crow curtain, and Henderson was denied a place to eat. After the trip, he filed a complaint with the ICC. The Southern Railroad changed its procedure to ensure that a similar situation would not reoccur; it guaranteed that a table would be exclusively reserved for blacks in the dining car. Satisfied, the ICC upheld this rule. Nevertheless, Henderson pursued his complaint in the judiciary and received support from the Truman Administration. Since the end of the war, President Harry S. Truman had spoken out in favor of extending civil rights, including the desegregation of interstate transportation, to African Americans. In the Henderson case, the Justice Department filed a brief challenging the court’s historic 1896 ruling in Plessy v. Ferguson, upholding segregated railroads. On June 5, 1950, a unanimous bench did not go as far as the Justice Department wanted, but it did find in favor of Henderson. The court held that the Southern Railroad’s revised practice still did not grant blacks equal access to dining facilities, because if some blacks filled the allotted table and others desired to eat, they remained barred from sitting at tables reserved for whites.171

169 Ibid., 53-55, 60, 63; Barnes, Journey from Jim Crow, 59-60.
170 Barnes, Journey from Jim Crow, 60.

The same day that the Supreme Court upheld Henderson’s claim, it also supported the arguments of black plaintiffs in cases involving admission to law school and equal treatment in graduate education. In Sweatt v. Painter the high tribunal decided that the separate law school Texas offered blacks did not provide a comparable education to that which whites received at the University of Texas Law School. In McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, the court overturned the policy of segregating black students from whites in classrooms, libraries, and other campus facilities at the University of Oklahoma Graduate School. Although the justices held that Texas and Oklahoma had violated the Fourteenth Amendment in enforcing these practices, they stopped short of decreeing that segregation inherently violated the Constitution.172 Nevertheless, this trio of decisions, along with the action taken by the Truman Administration in supporting them, clearly sent warning signals to the South that Jim Crow was coming increasingly under federal attack.

Progress in public accommodations remained halting as long as desegregation emerged on a case-by-case basis. By the end of 1950, blacks generally could claim access to first-class railroad cars. However, most African Americans traveled in second-class coaches, which court decisions had not addressed. As far as bus travel, despite the ruling in Morgan, and as the experience of the Journey of Reconciliation had shown, southern bus lines continued to practice segregation in interstate and intrastate travel. What desegregation existed was confined mainly to the Upper South and Border States.

---

LATINA/OS MOVEMENTS FOR DESEGREGATION OF PUBLIC ACCOMMODATIONS

In the years leading up to World War II, some Mexican Americans took a stand against all forms of segregation and discrimination, though they varied in their political ideologies and approaches. This burgeoning sense of activism stemmed from a few sources including mutualistas (mutual aid societies), the labor movement, an emerging middle class, and the military. Mexican Americans developed a concept of themselves as people deserving of civil rights by drawing on cultures of resistance and traditions that came from Mexico as well as those forged in dialogue with U.S. society.

In Arizona, for example, two major Mexican organizations, Alianza Hispano Americana (Hispanic American Alliance) and the Liga Protectora Latina (Latin Protective League) consciously avoided associations with Mexico in their titles and strove for acceptance in the U.S. During World War I, the Liga fought xenophobic campaigns in Arizona that sought to prohibit Mexicans from working in the mines. Liga emphasized Mexicans contributions to Arizona’s development and argued that they had been there since the founding of the state. In San Antonio, Texas, Luz Sáenz, a teacher and World War I veteran, joined with other mainly U.S.-born veteranos to form Order of Sons of America (OSA), an organization that encouraged recent Mexican immigrants to naturalize and participate in U.S. institutions. OSA worked alongside another middle class organization, Pan American Round Table, which attracted Mexican American and Anglo businessmen. This San Antonio-based organization embraced a politics of assimilation as well by promoting a positive “Hispanic-American” image and fighting “anti-Latin American” attitudes that accompanied downturns in the U.S. economy.\textsuperscript{173}

In Colorado, a growing sense of “us-versus-them” led to the formation of similar organizations in the 1920s. For example, Mexican American veterans of World War I formed a local branch of the American Legion in Greeley, Colorado to fight discrimination in public businesses and voting. According to historian Sarah Deutsch, the community came together for a boycott of shops in Greeley and Johnstown that displayed signs restricting Mexican patrons. These collective actions increased the confidence of Mexican residents and led to the establishment of mutualistas in nearby mining towns. Similarly, though the Denver community tended to be transient early on, by the late 1920s Mexican residents formed mutualistas for defense against social injustice in all public affairs.\textsuperscript{174}

Frequently, a culture of resistance grew out of Mexican immigrants’ survival of the Mexican Revolution and immigration as well as their lives as workers in Mexico and the U.S. Historian Devra Weber argues that many Mexican immigrants came to the United States prepared to fight for their rights because many had struggled against state oppression as either peasant farmers or industrial workers in Mexico prior to their arrival. For example, while mutual aid societies formed by many immigrant groups occasionally engaged in political work in the U.S., Mexican mutualistas constituted the “only legal arena for labor organization” in Mexico. Thus Mexican immigrants who organized similar organizations in the U.S. often thought of these institutions not only as social networks, but political ones as well. According to Weber, the ideology of these groups ranged from anarchism to cooperativism. During the strikes in California agriculture in the 1930s, these organizations served as support networks for activism against exploitative employers.175

\textsuperscript{173} F. Arturo Rosales, \textit{Chicano! The History of the Mexican American Civil Rights Movement} (Houston, TX: Arte Público Press, 1997), 90-91.

The labor struggles of the 1930s produced a resilient and dedicated cadre of Leftist Mexican Americans. A group known as El Congreso de Pueblos de Habla Española (the Congress of Spanish-Speaking Peoples, or “El Congreso”) best exemplifies the confluence of labor politics and civil rights organizing in this period. Organized in 1938 by a coalition of Mexican American and Mexican labor and community activists, the congress dealt with a range of issues affecting U.S. Latinos including immigration, civil and political rights, and the general status of the Mexican-descent minority of the United States. Luisa Moreno, a Guatemalan expatriate and veteran labor organizer, was one of the primary organizers of this group. The organization also served as the primary training ground for future Mexican American Civil Rights leaders such as Josefina Fierro de Bright, Ed Quevedo, and Bert Corona.176

Attracting nearly 1,000 delegates representing 128 Latino-oriented organizations from across the United States and Mexico, the First National Congress of Spanish-Speaking Peoples met in Los Angeles April 28-30, 1939. According to the agenda printed by the congress organizers, the most pressing issues facing the conference were education, housing and health, discrimination and segregation, and the complex issues involved in citizenship and naturalization. The platform broke new ground in a number of areas, but the group’s most important contribution was its insistence that all Spanish-speaking people--citizens and aliens alike--work together to better their conditions as residents of the United States. The congress attracted the support of a broad range of Mexican Americans and non-Mexican Americans in their civil rights and advocacy efforts. They included Hollywood actors such as Orson Welles, Anthony Quinn, and Rita Hayworth, as well as many influential, liberal California politicians.

El Congreso advocated Mexican American civil rights not by asking Mexican Americans to conform to American attitudes regarding Mexicans, but rather, challenging Americans to live up to the high democratic standards and principles they claimed to venerate. Departing from the cultural prescriptions of assimilation and Americanization, the congress demanded the recognition of a bilingual-bicultural society. The congress passed a resolution stating, “[the] cultural heritage of the Spanish-speaking people is part of the common heritage of the American people as a whole and should be preserved and extended for the common benefit of all the American people.” To support the continuation of Mexican/Latin American traditions in the U.S., El Congreso called for “the preservation of the language and cultural heritage of the Spanish-speaking people by obtaining for Spanish recognition and official status alongside . . . English in locations where the Spanish-speaking people constitute an important group, and educational facilities in both languages [as part of] an immediate campaign to wipe out illiteracy.”177

World War II, however, disrupted the agenda of El Congreso, since both Communist party and union leaders (both influences in the organization) opted for playing down civil rights activity in order to promote wartime unity. Despite a few rhetorical attempts to continue the campaign in this new context, enthusiasm for the struggle against fascism overran arguments for continued pressure on questions of civil rights. Moreover, El Congreso’s membership declined when many key members were inducted into the armed forces. Meanwhile, other organizations competed for the time and commitment of those that remained. Increasingly, congress members battled for the rights of Mexicans in other venues. Ironically, much of this work would mark the remaining membership of El Congreso with the “un-American” label, and a few, like Luisa Moreno, were either deported or encouraged to leave the country.178

Although World War II derailed El Congreso, it served as a catalyst for change for many other Mexican Americans. The Zoot Suit Riots of 1942 in Los Angeles, in which mostly Anglo sailors invaded public businesses to attack Mexican American youths dressed in long-coats and baggy pants, revealed the underlying prejudice towards people of Mexican descent in the U.S. during this period. As well, Mexican soldiers occasionally experienced the sting of racism. It was not uncommon for servicemen traveling between military training facilities in the Southwest to encounter signs at restaurants—particularly in Texas—that read: “We don’t serve dogs or Mexicans.” While many Mexican Americans quietly walked out, Fred Castro, a soldier born in La Verne and four fellow soldiers reacted by breaking everything in the restaurant.179 More often Mexican Americans took a less violent approach by engaging in radical journalism, organizing community groups, and engaging in public protest to challenge segregation prior to and throughout the war years.

Southern California

World War II had a significant effect on Mexican American consciousness about their civil rights and their relationship with whites. As many Chicano scholars have noted, the war against fascism raised the consciousness of many Americans concerning discrimination and prejudice on the home front, and motivated many minorities, including Mexican Americans, to engaged in civil rights struggles. For Mexican American soldiers who fought alongside whites, the feelings of camaraderie for some created the belief that the racial divide could be overcome. This heightened consciousness complemented a shift among a new “second” generation of Mexican Americans before the war who had already begun to question their subordinate position within society. This sense of entitlement to equal treatment generated by a youth movement and World War II led to movements for desegregation.180

Such a movement developed in the citrus suburbs of Southern California. The movement began largely through the attention brought to bear on segregation in the pages of a local Spanish-language newspaper El Espectador. Begun in 1933 by journalist and community organizer Ignacio Lutero López, the newspaper evolved from a source of community information to a lightening rod for action. Translated as “the spectator” or “the witness,” El Espectador gravitated toward the latter as López increasingly committed himself to reporting violations of Mexican American civil rights in addition to the news of community gatherings and social events in and around the Pomona Valley, east of Los Angeles.

178 Gutiérrez, Walls and Mirrors, 114-116.
180 García, Mexican Americans; Garcia, A World of Its Own, 226-228; George Sánchez, Becoming Mexican American: Ethnicity, Culture and Identity in Chicano Los Angeles, 1900-1945 (New York: Oxford University Press, 1993), 256.
From 1937 to its final publication in 1961, López and his colleagues pursued a civil rights agenda in El Espectador. A friend and fellow Mexican American journalist, Eugenio “ENO” Nogueras, provided López helpful advice on how to improve El Espectador. Nogueras published his own Spanish-language newspaper El Sol in San Bernardino, and occasionally wrote guest editorials concerning Mexican American civil rights for El Espectador under the heading “Sol y Sombra” (Sunshine and Shadow). In 1938, Beatriz and Ignacio López employed a local Mexican American lawyer, José M. Ibañez, to write a column entitled “La Ley” (The Law), in which he gave professional advice on legal battles common to most Mexican American residents. These changes instituted a more aggressive political agenda for El Espectador that López characterized as “not a combative newspaper,” but one that “is vigilant about reason and justice.”

Discrimination against Mexicans in public facilities represented one of the most objectionable forms of prejudice challenged by López and the newspaper. Stories of businesses that practiced the segregation of Mexicans or treated Mexicans as secondary citizens angered the Mexican American community and mobilized them for change. Movie theaters, for example, often restricted Mexicans from sitting in the center aisles, and forced them to sit in the less ideal aisle and balcony seats. The practice was so predictable, that when famous film director and actor Orson Welles wanted to evaluate audience response to his pre-released films, he frequently sat in the balcony disguised as a Mexican during previews at Pomona’s segregated Paramount Theater during the 1930s. In 1939, López reported the complaints of segregation by two young Mexican Americans patrons at another movie house, the Upland Theater (now the Grove) in Upland, California, which grew into a movement against such practices in San Gabriel/Pomona Valley. After purchasing their tickets, the two well-dressed, young adults proceeded to the center section where they were met by the assistant manager who directed them to sit in the front seats closest to the screen, the side aisles, or the balcony. The Mexican American man of the couple protested and inquired if the center section cost more and, if so, offered to pay to sit there. The assistant manager insisted that if they did not take the front seats, he would escort them out of the theater. “In such a rigid manner,” López wrote, “the management of the theater humiliated this Mexican couple, refusing them to sit where they desired, not because they were poorly dressed or because of poor manners, but because they were Mexicans.”

López went beyond reporting the incident, and consulted a lawyer about challenging the policy. The lawyer suggested that a legal case would be expensive and protracted, but a more effective strategy might be to start a boycott of the theater by Mexicans. López embraced his advice and called upon all Mexicans from the pages of El Espectador to support the boycott. López contended that the theater management had a right to refuse service to any one disturbing the film, regardless of race, but that this had not been the situation in this case. Promoting the boycott against not only the theater, but all other merchants who had business with the Upland Theatre, López promised, “El Espectador will support every action to combat this insult to our racial dignity, but we need the support of Every One of our readers.”

One week after the incident the Mexican American community of Upland, led by the Comisión Honorífica Mexicana (a Mexican mutual society sponsored by the Mexican consul) organized to carry out the boycott until the theater agreed to integrate the facility. The worried manager responded by proposing that he would allow Mexicans to seat themselves up to the center seats.

---

Comisión refused this proposal and announced that until the theater allowed Mexicans to sit wherever they pleased the boycott would continue. By this point, many Anglos supported the Mexican cause and threatened to join the boycott. “What this demonstrates to us,” López emphasized, “is that we are not alone in our struggle for recognition and racial equality.” The editor once again called on Mexicans to remain united and to recognize that they had the economic power to force change. “In this manner the first step is taken,” López concluded, “in the Mexican community’s defense of its dignity and in its struggle for civil rights.” After a month long boycott observed by Mexican Americans and whites, the theater’s owner was forced to rescind his segregationist policy. Signaling an embrace of the struggle by the white press, on March 3, 1939, the Ontario Daily Report announced: “No Discrimination Pledge: Mexican Organizations Win in Controversy over ‘Jim Crow’ Seat in Movie Theatres.”\(^\text{182}\)

Prior to World War II, the restriction of patrons of color from public pools extended throughout the Southwest and the country. In 1940, López published an article entitled “Quien Es El Culpable?” (Who is to Blame?), demanding an explanation for an ad in a local Pomona newspaper announcing that Mexicans would be permitted to use the local Ganesha Pool only on Fridays.\(^\text{183}\) The coverage of the problem by El Espectador and another Spanish-language daily El Sol de San Bernardino mobilized Mexican American community leaders in both cities to seek an end to these practices. In 1943, they filed suit in federal court on behalf of more than 8,000 Mexican Americans and Mexican nationals and against the mayor and city council of San Bernardino as well as other local officials for their complicity in segregating Mexican public schools. Federal Judge Leon Yanckwich ruled on behalf of the Mexican plaintiffs in the U.S. District Court case of López, et al. v. W.C. Seccombe et al. (1943), declaring the segregation of Mexicans in local swimming pools to be unconstitutional and a violation of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth amendments. Out of this struggle, Mexican Americans in San Bernardino organized a local defense committee, the Mexican-American Defense Committee, which not only applied public pressure on public pools, but also merchants displaying “White Trade Only” signs in their windows.\(^\text{184}\) Similarly, the NAACP challenged discrimination at the Brookside Plunge in Pasadena in Stone v. Board of Directors of the City of Pasadena, and successfully desegregated the pool by 1947.\(^\text{185}\)

Activist journalism, frustration with discrimination, and the dramatic developments around World War II generated protests and boycotts throughout the San Bernardino and San Gabriel Valleys. In 1938, Mexican Americans challenged discrimination in an Ontario bar with a boycott. In 1939, López challenged Azusa city government for restricting Mexicans’ use of a public park for a Mexican Independence Day celebration. In 1946, he spurred the Mexican American community to challenge Mountain View Cemetery in San Bernardino for segregating black and Mexican graves. Although they admitted that the practice was morally indefensible, they argued that they could not go against public opinion. Once again, only a boycott could change their minds.\(^\text{186}\)

The success of these challenges led to a broad political coalition known as the Unity Leagues, consisting of Mexican American business owners, college students, community leaders, war \(^{182}\) Ibid., 233; García, Mexican Americans, 86-87.

\(^{184}\) Ibid., 88.

\(^{186}\) García, Mexican Americans, 89.
veterans, and white allies. In some areas, Mexicans collaborated with the Asian American and African American community leaders. Although World War II temporarily diverted attention away from Mexican American civil rights during the mid-1940s, it also served as a catalyst to a more aggressive movement after the war and contributed to the determination of Unity League members. For example, Cande Mendoza remembered his attitude after returning from the warfront as he tried for the second time to secure a teaching job in Pomona: He recalled: “I said, ‘Here I am, I’m back again!’ And, you know this time I was a little more assertive I guess, because I said to myself, ‘My gosh, I went into World War II, and I was overseas for two years, and served with George Patton’s third army as an infantryman attached to a tank and battalion, and . . . if they tell me they are not going to give me the job this time, they’re going to find the activist in me coming out.’ So, things had changed by that time, and they did give me a job.”187 In 1946, Mendoza collaborated with López to form the first chapter of the Unity League in Pomona. He remembered: “Ignacio López and I started a group in Pomona called the Pomona Unity League, which we called “pul”--P.U.L--and I was sort of the executive secretary . . . [The group consisted of] young people that just got back from the service, and gals. We went through registration for voting, and that helped.”188

The activities of the Unity Leagues went well beyond the goals of desegregating public facilities towards the goal of electing public officials sympathetic to nonwhite concerns and registering nonwhite voters. It is appropriate to note that the Unity Leagues grew out of these desegregation campaigns and forged unity among Mexicans, sympathetic whites, and other people of color. Among early Anglo supporters of this movement, Fred Ross, a field director for the American Council on Race Relations, lent his time and organizing skills to the formation of eight Unity Leagues. Ross had originally been sent to San Bernardino Valley during the mid-1940s to investigate the local Ku Klux Klan who had allegedly burned to death black civil rights activist O’Day Short and his family on Christmas Day, 1945. Upon his arrival, Ross contacted Ruth Tuck, a sociologist at the University of Redlands and a friend of Ignacio López. After an introduction from Tuck in 1946, Ross became fast friends with López, and the two took numerous trips throughout the Mexican American and African American communities, sharing ideas about organizing and building interracial coalitions. Ross’s activities upset Council directors in Chicago who expected Ross to survey and report back his findings, but not to engage in political organizing. Ross’s actions, however, caught the attention of Saul Alinsky, the founder of the Industrial Areas Foundation (IAF) an organization committed to empowering minority and unrepresented working class communities to demand social justice, enfranchisement, and better education and civil services. Alinsky championed the work of Ross and eventually recruited him to serve as one of his West Coast representatives. Following IAF-style strategies, López and Ross organized fifty young Mexican American men and women and founded Unity Leagues in towns throughout the citrus belt, including prominent orders in Pomona, Chino, Ontario, San Bernardino, and Redlands. In areas such as Riverside and San Diego where Mexicans shared community space with blacks and Asian Americans, the Unity Leagues were multiracial organizations that sought common cause across racial and ethnic lines.189

Mexican American members of the Unity Leagues found allies in African Americans, Asian Americans, and progressive whites for an anti-racist movement. Although more research is necessary, archives reveal that Mexican Americans worked with African Americans in particular as collaborators and co-creators in these civil rights organizations. For example, in the Riverside 187 Garcia, A World of Its Own, 234.

188 Ibid., 234-235.
189 Ibid., 235.
colonia. Casa Blanca, Mexicans composed ninety percent, blacks eight percent, and Japanese Americans the remainder of the total population of about 3,500, but members maintained a slate of officers consisting of three African Americans and four Mexican Americans. Belen Reyes, a Mexican American woman, was the first President, while an African American, J. R. Riggins, served as the vice-president. As one of their first protests, the league joined with the local NAACP to present an ordinance to the Riverside City Council demanding the elimination of “White Trade Only” signs from all places of business. Building on this success, Belen Reyes demanded and won equal bussing services to public schools for Mexican American and African American children, and lobbied local politicians to support the removal of local Jim Crow laws. These actions stand as a testament to the anti-racist vision of the Unity Leagues and suggest that Mexican Americans within these organizations saw an affinity with African Americans. Rather than basing their demands for equality on claims of being “white,” Mexican American Unity Leaguers embraced a non-white identity and fought for the eradication of all forms of racial discrimination in Southern California.

During the late forties, many organizers in the Unity Leagues such as Fred Ross moved to East Los Angeles to help organize and register Mexican Americans. There he found a frustrated, but determined Mexican American community with intentions of claiming a share of the local politics. The Community Service Organization (CSO) was created in 1947, and became the primary vehicle for supporting Latino politicians and empowering Latino voters. This grassroots organization helped elect Edward Roybal to the Los Angeles City Council in 1949, the first person of Mexican descent to serve on that body since 1888. After Roybal’s victory, CSO shifted its concentration to fighting housing discrimination, police brutality, and school segregation. Roybal, in particular, became an outspoken critic of discrimination against Mexican residents regardless of their citizenship status. This strategy won over many recent Mexican arrivals in his district, creating a stable support network well into the future. In 1950 the organization fielded 112 volunteer deputy registrars who, within three months, registered 32,000 new Latino voters. By the early 1960s it had 34 chapters with 10,000 dues-paying members, and became one of the main vehicles for training Latino activists like César Chávez who would later go on to form the United Farm Workers of America.

Texas/Arizona

Movements of desegregation also developed in Texas during the 1930s and 1940s. Historian David Montejano cautions that Jim Crow for Mexicans declined at an unequal pace across the state, and that change tended to come to rural areas more slowly than to urban. In rural districts, company stores and the control of white ranchers tended to be more thorough and long lasting. In urban areas, as in Southern California towns, merchants and business owners tended to be more dependent on consumers, and therefore were more susceptible to economic pressures such as boycotts. Competition among businesses signified vulnerability in the racial order, since Tejanos could leverage to secure concessions and rights. As well, social conflict and national crisis in the form of World War II provided another impulse in the decline of the old race arrangements in Texas. In addition to encouraging Mexican beliefs in the possibilities of change, the continued existence of Jim Crow treatment of Mexicans in Texas presented the United States with an embarrassing and counterproductive image while trying to forge positive relations with Latin America. These

190 Ibid., 236.
191 Gutiérrez, Walls and Mirrors, 170-171.
192 Acuña, Occupied America, 315. Ross served as Chávez’s mentor during his years with CSO and he joined the UFW. conditions made de jure segregation a problematic and ultimately untenable situation to maintain after 1940.193

In Texas, a civil rights group, the League of United Latin American Citizens (LULAC), contributed the earliest and most aggressive push towards desegregation in public facilities. Modeled on the NAACP, LULAC was a largely middle-class organization that strove first and foremost for integration. The name of the group provides some idea of the politics of the organization. Historians David Gutiérrez and Neil Foley have pointed out that LULAC’s emphasis on “Latin American” rather than Mexican (all the affiliates came from Mexican American backgrounds) demonstrates that members recognized the stigma of identifying as a Mexican in Texas society. “Mexican” had largely become a racial term equal to nonwhite that LULAC wanted to distance itself from. Unlike the Unity Leagues in Southern California, LULACers did not seek common cause with African Americans and other nonwhite racial minorities. Rather, LULAC based all their claims to civil rights on the fact that they were white by virtue of the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, and therefore should not be segregated. Finally, LULAC’s emphasis on citizenship indicates that they preferred to act in the name of Mexican Americans, not Mexican immigrants.194

These limits to their advocacy work notwithstanding, LULAC contributed to the desegregation of public accommodations through diplomacy, economic activism, and the legal system. In 1937, for example, LULAC challenged a theater in San Angelo for attempting to segregate local Mexicans to the balcony during a benefit involving a Mexican orchestra. LULAC first protested to the mayor but to no avail. Unsatisfied with his response, LULAC asked the orchestra to join in the protest. The orchestra agreed to join in the fight, and pledged not to perform in San Angelo until Mexicans could sit wherever they pleased in the theater. Threatened with the concert cancellations, the theater managers conceded to the orchestra’s demands and allowed Mexican Americans unrestricted seating.

In situations where diplomacy did not work, LULAC resorted to the boycott. In 1940, a new movie theater in San Angelo segregated Mexicans along with blacks in the balcony. On behalf of Mexican patrons, LULAC president General A. M. Fernández tried to persuade the theater to abandon the policy on the grounds that it complicated President Roosevelt’s attempt to ensure Latin American loyalty to the Allied forces through the Good Neighbor Policy. Evidence of segregation, it was argued, would undermine the government sponsored exchanges and cultural programming depicting close, amicable relations among Anglo Americans and Americans of Latin American descent on both sides of the border. Unmoved by these pleas, the theater continued with its policy, triggering Fernández to call on Mexican Americans to boycott the theater until it ended segregation. LULAC’s strategy succeeded. In addition to theaters, LULAC also successfully protested segregation of Mexican Americans in swimming pools, restaurants, hospitals, and other forms of public accommodation throughout Texas.195

LULAC also went to court to end segregation on juries. In Hernández v. Texas LULAC challenged the conviction of Pete Hernández for the murder of another farm worker, Joe Espinosa, on the grounds that discrimination had been practiced in the selection of juries in Texas. The lawyer pointed out that while fifteen percent of Jackson County’s almost thirteen thousand residents were Mexican Americans, no such person had served on any jury commission, grand jury, or petit jury in Jackson County in the previous quarter century. Despite this situation, several lower courts upheld the conviction and denied that Hernández’s Fourteenth Amendment rights had been violated. LULAC attorneys, however, took the case all the way to the United States Supreme Court. On May 3, 1954, Chief Justice Earl Warren delivered the unanimous opinion of the Court in Hernandez v. Texas, extending the aegis of the Fourteenth Amendment to Peter Hernández and reversing his conviction.

---

While the court case is seen as an important extension of the Fourteenth Amendment to Latinos, the court came to some rather odd conclusions about why Mexican Americans suffered injustice in the court and in Texas society. The court did not apply the Fourteenth Amendment to Hernández on the ground that Mexican Americans constitute a protected racial group. Rather, the court held that Hernández merited Fourteenth Amendment protection because he belonged to a class, distinguishable on some basis “other than race or color.” The court made this argument despite the fact that during the trial lawyers pointed out that the bathrooms in the original courthouse where the first trial took place were segregated with “Colored Men” and “Hombres Aquí” written across the door. The refusal of the court to see this segregation of public accommodations and access to juries as racial in nature highlights the ambiguity of the racial status of Mexican people in the United States.

The efforts of LULAC in Texas extended to other Southwestern states as well, including Arizona. In Phoenix, for example, Mexican Americans were treated as second-class citizens, as one witness, Val Cordova, explained: “Here in Phoenix, up to World War II, we could not live where we wanted to. In some areas they would not rent or sell to a Mexican American. At the Fox Theater, you had to sit upstairs. At the Studio Theater, in downtown Phoenix, you couldn’t even get in. At the public parks, such as, for example, University Park—which was founded and maintained with city tax dollars which we all paid—a Mexican American was not permitted.” As in Texas and California, consciousness about Civil Rights growing out of the war experience converged with activism among some Mexican Americans to challenge the status quo. Members of a local chapter of LULAC and the mutual aid society, Alianza Hispano Americanas, questioned segregation during the war years, though their emphasis was mainly on desegregation of public schools.

As in California, World War II motivated many Mexican Americans to challenge discrimination in Texas and throughout the Southwest. For Mexican Americans who served in the war, the hypocrisy of U.S. racism offended them deeply since they had risked their lives in defense of the country. In 1948, World War II veteran Dr. Héctor García and some of his fellow Mexican American veterans formed the GI Forum to combat discrimination against Mexicans. The idea came to García as he recuperated from a serious kidney ailment in his hometown of Corpus Christi. Angered by the Naval hospitals’ refusal to admit veterans except in emergencies and their segregation of patients by race, García promised himself that when he recovered, he would devote his life to ending such discrimination. The charismatic García joined with fellow veteranos Cris Aldrete and Ed Idar in 1948, and by the end of that year, the GI Forum had chapters throughout most of South Texas. During this critical first year and throughout the existence of the organization, men were supported by the Mexican American women, such as the founder’s sister, Cleotilde García, M.D., who carried the burden of daily life. In García’s case, the sister cared for her own patients as well as her brothers while Héctor García pursued this public civil rights agenda. Ironically, young women eventually participated in the organization as a “girls division.”

Following a similar political philosophy of integration and assimilation advocated by LULAC, GI Forum struggled for the fair treatment of Mexican Americans. “We were Americans, not ‘spics’ or ‘greasers,’” García recalled, “because when you fight for your country in a World War, against an alien philosophy, fascism, you are an American and proud to be in America.” The GI Forum initially agreed to be nonpartisan, though they encouraged individual members to become active in the political process. Individual members actively supported candidates who believed that government could play a role in ending discrimination. This often included those politicians who played heir to the New Deal legacy, including Lyndon B. Johnson, a powerful senator from Texas.197

This connection helped the GI Forum fulfill some of its goals within the political system, including getting Spanish surname people named to the local draft board. In 1949, the GI Forum called on Johnson to support their challenge to discrimination in Texas cemeteries. Félix Longoria, a U.S. volunteer had been killed by the Japanese army in Philippines, but the manager of the sole funeral home in his hometown, Three Rivers, refused to bury him on account that white patrons would object. Sara Moreno, sister of Longoria’s widow and the president of the American GI Forum girls’ division, took action by contacting Héctor García. While the Longorias struggled with the funeral director T. W. Kennedy to reach a suitable agreement, García notified the Corpus Christi Caller-Times, seventeen members of the media, and top elected officials about the insult suffered by the family. Johnson, who had benefited from Mexican American support in his election to the U.S. Senate, saw an opportunity to solidify his support with veterans and Mexican Texans by resolving the crisis. Following lengthy discussions with local leaders and the funeral home director, Johnson contacted García with the message, “We want to help you and your people. As long as you do everything peacefully, we will help you in every way that you need help.” Finally, in response to several days of peaceful protest, Johnson sent a telegram to García, which he read aloud to over one thousand people:

I deeply regret to learn that the prejudice of some individuals extends even beyond this life. I have no authority over civilian funeral homes. Nor does the federal government. However, I have today made arrangements to have Felix Longoria buried with full military honors at Arlington National Cemetery, here at Washington, where the honored dead of our nation’s War rest… There will be no cost…. This injustice and prejudice is deplorable. I am happy to have a part in seeing that this Texas hero is laid to rest with the honor and dignity his service deserves.198

The resolution marked an important victory for Mexican American civil rights and earned Johnson and the Democratic Party the loyalty of many Mexican Texans for years to come. As a result of this success, the GI Forum deviated from LULAC’s example and their earlier policy of nonpartisanship by organizing “get-out-the-vote” drives and endorsing candidates.199

198 Johnson as quoted in Pycior, LBJ & Mexican Americans, 70.
199 F. Arturo Rosales, Chicoano! The History of the Mexican American Civil Rights Movement (Houston, TX: Arte Público Press, 1997), 97.
Mexican American veterans elsewhere also organized American Legion Posts that pursued similar goals with the same political strategies as the GI Forum. In Phoenix, Arizona, for example, Frank Fuentes and Ray Martinez founded a division of the American Legion Posts to fight for integrated GI housing over the fervent protests of white veterans. While more research must be done, it is evident that resistance to segregation and discrimination existed among Mexican Americans across the Southwest in the wake of World War II.

Baseball

Major League baseball also subjected some people of Latin American descent to segregation and discrimination. Baseball’s officials intended to keep blacks out of the game, and therefore, targeted Latin players who could not “pass” as white. Consequently, the experience of Latino players ranged from acceptance to exclusion from Major League Baseball.

Cuban-born Esteban Bellán, who arrived in the U.S. in order to attend Fordham University, became the first Latin American player in the major leagues when he joined the Troy Haymakers of the National Association of Professional Base Ball Players in 1871. During the first two decades of the twentieth century, the number of players from Mexican, Cuban, Puerto Rican, Colombian, and Venezuelan backgrounds grew with the sport and became important contributors to the success of teams such as the Philadelphia Athletics and the Cincinnati Reds. In all of these later cases, the players avoided restrictions against black players because of their light skin. For example, in 1911 the Cincinnati Reds signed two Cuban players, Rafael Almeida from Havana and Armando Marsans from Mantanzas. Although the two came to the United States as members of the Cuban Stars, a club that competed primarily against black teams in the Negro Leagues, Almeida and Marsans were invited to play in the white-only major leagues because of their lighter complexions, exceptional talents, and elite backgrounds.

For Afro-Latinos, however, playing in the big leagues was as impossible as it was for African American players. According to Monte Irvin, a former American black league and major league player of a different era, “you could have all the ability in the world [before 1947] as a Latin playing in Puerto Rico, Venezuela, Santo Domingo, or Panama, but you could not play [in the major leagues]. So as a Latin black you were in the same situation as [an] American black.”Interestingly, the first Latin player, Esteban Bellán, was reportedly black, but played at a time before segregation in the game became so rigid. After the Plessy v. Ferguson decision, which affirmed “separate but equal” accommodations, major league baseball followed suit and imposed strict segregation on the game.

These conditions did not prevent Afro-Latinos from playing baseball in the United States. Some toured the U.S. with the Cuban Stars, a team made up of Cuban players of various shades of darkness. One player, José Méndez, known as the “Black Diamond,” out duelled famous major league pitchers such Eddie Plank and Christy Mathewson during the 1920s, and struck out Babe Ruth on several occasions during the 1920s. Méndez played with the Cuban Stars and on Negro league teams until 1926. Several Negro league managers saw the benefits of incorporating Cuban players on their roster and recruited them throughout the 1920s and 30s.

---

201 Ibid., 35.
African Americans and Afro-Latinos were barred because of color from the game until Jackie Robinson shattered the color line in 1947 by playing with the Brooklyn Dodgers. According to historian Samuel Regalado, however, an Afro-Cuban infielder, Silvio García, almost became the first player to challenge segregation in the big leagues. Regalado writes, “Although accounts conflict, [Branch] Rickey . . . shied away from García after the prideful Cuban said he would kill any man who slapped him in the face.” Instead, the Dodger president signed Jackie Robinson, who famously endured insults and injury to become the first black player to play in the major leagues.

After 1947, conditions did not immediately improve for African Americans or Afro-Latinos. In addition to confronting hostility on major league diamonds, frequently players played in the minor leagues often located in the South and Midwest where Jim Crow persisted. Victor Pellot Power, a young, black Puerto Rican, was contracted by the New York Yankees to play in their farm system in Kansas City in 1951. There he encountered segregated movie houses, restaurants, and other public facilities, and was forced to sleep in morgues on the road because no hotel would allow him to stay in their rooms. Local fans booed him despite the fact that Power hit .349 for the team and won the American Association’s batting title. Although his achievement deserved promotion, Yankees management resisted integration of the major league team and traded him to Philadelphia before spring training in 1953. According to historian Samuel Regalado, the Yankees chafed at the idea of bringing Power up to New York because “he was prone to exhibit his Latin pride and respond to aggressors regardless of skin color.” As well, Yankees officials took exception to Power’s apparent relationship with a white woman, who actually was his Puerto Rican-born wife who enjoyed wearing blond wigs.202

Power joined the Athletics in 1954 and became the team’s regular first baseman. Unfortunately, in 1955, the team moved to Kansas City where Power faced the same discrimination that haunted him as a minor league player. In addition to confronting Jim Crow laws in public accommodations, the Kansas City police routinely stopped and questioned him and his wife for no apparent reason other than that he was black. Reflecting on his life in the big leagues, Vic Power commented, “Being a human being I never thought people [were] going to be like that, making me live alone…go nowhere.” Powers added, “But what can you do? You can’t do anything except play harder.”203

Numerous other Afro-Latino players experienced the same humiliation as Power did along with the greatest players of the game including Dominicans Manny Mota, Felipe Alou, and Juan Marichal, and Puerto Ricans Orlando Cepeda and Roberto Clemente. These men passed on stories as each new Latin recruit came into Major League Baseball as either major league starters or minor league players to prepare the next generation for the difficulties of life in America for blacks. Manny Mota captured the sentiment among Latin black players best when he explained, “[Orlando Cepeda and Felipe Alou] told me what to expect. Another coach prepared me mentally to face it and that’s what I did. [But] I never realized it was going to be that bad.”204 Rather than quit, many persevered, and helped Latino baseball players become a permanent fixture in the major leagues.

202 Ibid., 74.
203 Ibid., 76.
204 Ibid, 76-79.
PART FOUR, 1954-1964

THE MODERN CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT

The Interstate Commerce Commission Rules

Clearly African Americans needed a ruling that both challenged segregation and applied it uniformly. To this end, on December 14, 1953, the NAACP petitioned the ICC to void all segregation rules promulgated by transportation companies and applied to the facilities they maintained. Shortly after, on May 17, 1954, the Supreme Court issued its landmark opinion in Brown v. Board of Education, which outlawed public school segregation. In conformity with this ruling, on November 7, 1955, the ICC announced that the separate but equal doctrine was dead with respect to interstate transportation and the stations and waiting rooms provided for passengers. The Pittsburgh Courier rejoiced over the end of a policy that “flaunted the humiliation of a third of the South’s population, with every train, bus, railroad station, ticket office and lunch room a symbol of their subjugation.”\(^{205}\) Despite this elation, the battle did not end. Most railroads continued to maintain a dual policy toward interstate (illegal) and intrastate (permissible) segregation. In addition, the ICC order did not specifically affect independently operated restaurants at the terminals.

The Baton Rouge Bus Boycott

Even before the Brown and ICC decrees, southern blacks had organized to challenge Jim Crow transportation in their own communities. Bus segregation in Baton Rouge, Louisiana followed the pattern of the rest of the South. Blacks sat in the back in the “colored section” and whites sat in the front. If more whites boarded the bus and filled the available seats, the bus driver pushed the line of demarcation further back to accommodate whites, thereby unseating black passengers. The reverse was not true; if all the seats were occupied in the “colored section” and seats in the white area remained empty, black riders had to stand. As in many southern cities, African Americans constituted a majority of those who rode buses, and the inconvenience together with the rude treatment from bus drivers were a constant source of irritation.

In March 1953, Baton Rouge blacks convinced the city council to enact a law that allowed African American riders to take their seats on a “first-come, first-serve” basis starting from the rear. Whites would still sit in the front, but they could not force black passengers already seated to stand if there were no empty seats. Although segregation remained intact, the bus drivers refused to accept the new policy and went on strike. Moreover, the Louisiana attorney general ruled that the local ordinance violated the state’s segregation law and nullified it.\(^{206}\)

In protest, Baton Rouge blacks, led by the Reverend T. J. Jemison, initiated a boycott against the bus system. Jemison had come to the city in 1949 after receiving a B.A. from Alabama State College, an M.A. from Virginia Union, and taking additional graduate work at New York University. As pastor of the Mt. Zion Baptist Church, one of the largest in Baton Rouge, he used his pulpit to rally the mass of blacks behind the boycott and conducted nightly mass meetings that attracted overflow crowds. The creation of the United Defense League (UDL), a coalition of religious and secular community groups, reflected this solidarity. The UDL successfully operated a car pool for black passengers. After a week, the boycott proved nearly 100 percent effective and had cost the bus company considerable revenue losses; hence, the city offered a compromise plan, which the UDL accepted. According to the agreement, the two front seats on buses would be reserved for whites, the long rear seat would be reserved for blacks, and the rest of the seats would be filled on a first-come, first-serve basis with whites moving from front to rear and blacks in the reverse direction. On June 25, a mass meeting of 8,000 blacks voted for this plan, and the boycott ended. The victory did not produce a complete end to segregation, but it did reduce many of the annoyances that black riders had experienced.207

---

\(^{205}\) Barnes, Journey from Jim Crow, 101.

The Montgomery Bus Boycott

Two-and-one-half years later, events in Montgomery, Alabama helped transform the burgeoning civil rights movement and extended judicial rulings to outlaw segregation on local buses. For several years in the early 1950s, the Women’s Political Council (WPC), composed of female black professionals interested in civic improvements, had been concerned with the treatment African Americans received on public buses, the majority of whose passengers were black women. The problems in Montgomery were similar to those in Baton Rouge—discourteous white drivers and a system that upended blacks and moved them to the rear, whether seats were available or not, as more whites boarded the bus. The group’s determination increased after Brown dealt a blow to the principle of segregation in education. Failing to convince municipal authorities to take action, the WPC looked for an incident to rally the community around.

After several false starts, it found the right moment on December 1, 1955, when Rosa Parks refused to vacate her seat to a white man on a crowded bus. Mrs. Parks, a forty-two-year-old seamstress, had encountered trouble on buses before, coincidentally with the same bus driver, James Blake, but on this day she balked. The bus driver had her arrested, and she was bailed out by E. D. Nixon, an official of A. Philip Randolph’s Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters and a man with whom she had worked closely in the local NAACP. Over the years, Nixon had been a steady voice for challenging Jim Crow and extending the franchise. He had the respect of working people within Montgomery, and he led the charge to help construct a new organization to mobilize blacks immediately after Parks’s arrest. Nixon elicited the help of Clifford Durr, a white Montgomery lawyer, who with his wife Virginia, supported interracial democracy. This incident set in motion a yearlong boycott.

As suggested above, the inspiration for the protest came from secular leaders, but the boycott would have had little chance of success without the leadership of the clergy. Jo Ann Gibson Robinson, an English professor at Alabama State College and an official of the WPC, quickly sprang into action after Parks’ arrest. She commandeered her college’s mimeograph machine to print flyers announcing a one-day boycott of the buses and dispatched students and WPC members to distribute leaflets throughout the community. At the same time, supporters of the boycott had to line up influential clergy who had the power to mobilize the mass of blacks through their churches. As a result, the fledgling movement recruited a twenty-six-year-old relative newcomer to Montgomery, the Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr., to lead the Montgomery Improvement Association (MIA). King presided over the Dexter Avenue Baptist Church, down the street from the state Capitol, and he tapped as his closest ally the Reverend Ralph David Abernathy, who had graduated from Alabama State and headed the First Baptist Church. The meeting to create the MIA originated at the Mt. Zion AME Church, illustrating the importance of churches in providing public space for sustaining a mass movement. The one-day boycott on Monday, December 4 proved a great success as blacks uniformly stayed off the buses, and that evening at a mass meeting at the Holt Street Baptist Church, the MIA decided to continue the boycott. Throughout the coming year, church meetings, with their inspirational sermons and singing of Negro spirituals, would sustain the faith of the demonstrators in the face of severe resistance from the white community.

207 Ibid., 19-24; Adam Fairclough, Race & Democracy, The Civil Rights Struggle in Louisiana 1915-1972, (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1995), 158-62. It was not until 1962 that the federal courts finally brought a cessation to bus segregation in the city.

The leaders of the MIA, perhaps buoyed by the overwhelming support for the Monday boycott and also underestimating the resolve of Montgomery officials to preserve segregation, did not expect a lengthy struggle at first. Moreover, their demands were very reasonable. They initially accepted the framework of segregation, agreeing to reserve ten seats at the front of the bus for whites and having the remainder allocated on a first-come, first-serve arrangement. However, if more than ten whites boarded the bus, blacks would have to vacate the adjacent seats and move further back. The MIA wanted black bus drivers hired for predominantly black routes, demanded that white drivers respond courteously to black passengers, and called for blacks to pay the fare at the front of the bus and board there instead of the rear door as they customarily did. These demands seemed so mild to the NAACP that it would not endorse them until they challenged segregation directly and completely. Indeed, this would soon happen as the city commission refused to accede to even these requests and black leaders, such as Dr. King, came under assault. After King’s house was bombed on January 30, black leaders resolved to hold out for full and unqualified integration of the buses.208

The boycott continued throughout 1956. Mass meetings bolstered the morale of men and women who had to find alternative ways of getting to work and tending to their daily activities. Toward this end, after consulting with the Reverend Jemison from Baton Rouge, the MIA organized car pools. In addition, some white housewives surreptitiously drove their own automobiles to pick up their maids upon whom they depended for keeping their homes running smoothly. The car pool prompted the city to fight back on February 21 by arresting and indicting Dr. King and some ninety leaders of the boycott on charges of conducting an illegal boycott. At the same time, the NAACP filed a federal lawsuit on behalf of five black women challenging bus segregation, and on June 5, 1956, a three-judge panel in Alabama sustained the plaintiffs’ arguments. Still, Montgomery officials would not capitulate even though the bus company, experiencing financial ruin, wanted to concede. The legal battle reached a climax on November 13, when the U.S. Supreme Court affirmed the lower court’s ruling and stipulated that the Fourteenth Amendment prohibited racial segregation on intrastate as well as interstate transportation. Finally, on December 21, the Reverend King alongside several black and white companions boarded a bus to take an historic, non-segregated ride.209

The court’s ruling in Browder provided a clear precedent against segregated interstate transportation, but as with school integration cases, southern blacks had to file numerous lawsuits to force their communities and states to implement the historic decision. By 1960, forty-seven cities in the South had removed segregation from their bus lines. Most of these (thirty-eight) came in the states of the southern periphery, including Virginia, North Carolina, Tennessee, Arkansas, Oklahoma, Texas, and Florida. In these states desegregation had resulted from court cases and not successful boycotts. In Mississippi the buses remained segregated, and the only deep South cities that permitted desegregation on public conveyances were New Orleans, Montgomery, and Atlanta.\footnote{210}

---

The Tallahassee Bus Boycott

The Montgomery boycott did not trigger a widespread outbreak of similar movements. In 1957, Dr. King and other civil rights-oriented ministers had created the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC) for the purpose of spreading across the South nonviolent, direct-action drives along the lines of Montgomery. The founding of the SCLC took place in Atlanta, Georgia at the Ebenezer Baptist Church, where King’s father was pastor and where Martin would join him in 1960. The results of the group’s initial efforts were meager. In Rock Hill, South Carolina, a boycott lasted for six months but managed only to put the bus company out of business. A bus boycott in Tallahassee, Florida’s capital and a short drive from the Georgia state line, lasted longer, but ended in deadlock after nearly two years. In May 1956, two coeds, Wilhemina Jakes and Carrie Patterson, attending historically black Florida A & M University declined to relinquish their seats to whites on a Cities Transit bus and were arrested. The next day, students at A & M held a meeting and decided to boycott the buses for the remainder of the school term, which ended in two weeks. Following up on the students’ actions, clergymen led by the Reverend C. K. Steele, pastor of the Bethel Missionary Baptist Church and one of the charter members of the SCLC, convened a mass meeting at his church and created the Inter Civic Council (ICC), modeled on the MIA, to pursue the boycott.\footnote{211}

With the protest effectively plunging the bus company into the financial red, the city fought back. It arrested the leaders of the car pool, tried and convicted them, thereby seriously hampering the boycott. After the federal courts overthrew Jim Crow on Montgomery’s buses, the ICC tested its application in Tallahassee and was rebuffed. Furthermore, by New Year’s Day, 1957, ICC leaders had received a stream of telephone threats and violent assaults against their homes and businesses. Fearing the upsurge of racial tensions, Governor LeRoy Collins ordered the suspension of bus service and tried working out a compromise. The ensuing agreement did not change much as the city council authorized bus drivers to assign seats based on the passengers’ “health, safety, and welfare.” This policy resembled Pupil Placement Laws that the South had adopted to forestall desegregation in education. Nevertheless, the city finally allowed desegregation to occur on predominantly black bus routes.\footnote{212}

Desegregation in Washington, D.C.

In the meantime, blacks shattered segregation in public accommodations in several areas further north, especially in Washington, D.C., which reflected the racial mores and practices of a typical southern city. In the 1950s the District witnessed a good deal of progress in desegregating public accommodations. The forces set in motion by the Howard University students in the 1940s yielded benefits a decade later. After the Supreme Court affirmed the legality of the 1872 Reconstruction

\begin{footnotes}
\item[210] Barnes, ibid., 128.
\item[212] Tom Wagy, Governor LeRoy Collins of Florida: Spokesman of the New South (University, AL.: University of Alabama Press, 1985) 74-78; Morris, Origins, 65-67; Rabby, The Pain and the Promise, 52-58.
\end{footnotes} law that prohibited racial exclusion from public restaurants, as Pauli Murray had first suggested a decade earlier, in 1953, President Dwight D. Eisenhower worked behind-the-scenes to persuade District movie theatres, hotels, motels, and restaurants to cater to black patrons on an equal basis with whites. The president, who believed that racial problems could be solved through education rather than governmental coercion, preferred to operate quietly and without fanfare to wipe away what he considered obvious discrimination aimed at black citizens. Nowhere did he feel more comfortable in doing this than in federal institutions under federal control, such as in the military, and in the District of Columbia, what he referred to as the “nation’s showplace.” Tolerating racial bias in the country’s seat of government at a time when Eisenhower was fighting a Cold War against the Soviet Union and its tyranny “behind the Iron Curtain” only harmed the nation’s image and ability to wage its anti-Communist propaganda war. The chief executive expressed reservations about trying to use federal power to desegregate educational facilities under the traditional authority of the states, but he felt far less restrained in areas under national jurisdiction. Consequently, in 1953, the Board of D.C. Commissioners ended segregation in facilities under its control and after a request by President Eisenhower, the Board of Recreation followed suit and desegregated holdings within its purview. Notwithstanding these achievements, by the end of the decade the District’s bowling alleys and amusement parks remained segregated.213

Massive Resistance

Elsewhere, Jim Crow continued to reign. The 1955 ICC proclamation against segregated transit made little difference in the heart of Dixie. The commission failed to enforce its decree vigorously and instead relied on a slow, cumbersome case-by-case approach. After the Brown decision the South embarked on a program of massive resistance to segregation that lifted the barriers to racial equality even higher than before. White Citizen’s Councils formed to apply pressure on African Americans to back off from their pursuit of first-class citizenship and equal access to public accommodations and education. Resurrected Ku Klux Klan Klaverns unleashed a wave of terrorism to reinforce black subordination.214

The Boynton Case

In this heated climate on December 20, 1958, Bruce Boynton, a third-year law student at Howard University boarded a Trailways bus in Washington, D.C. to return to his home in Selma, Alabama for the Christmas holidays. At a stopover in Richmond, Virginia, Boynton entered a segregated restaurant, which operated independently of the bus company. He took a seat at the lunch counter reserved for whites when the black section appeared too crowded. Refusing to leave the racially restricted area, he was arrested for trespass and found guilty. The NAACP handled his case as it made its way up to the U.S. Supreme Court. On December 5, 1960, the high tribunal agreed with the NAACP’s argument that regardless of whether bus terminal restaurants were privately owned, they were an integral part of the flow of interstate commerce and under federal law could not impose segregation, which hampered travel.215

---

213 Robert F. Burk, The Eisenhower Administration and Black Civil Rights (Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1984), 45-54. Furthermore, in 1957, Eisenhower supported and signed into law the Civil Rights Act, which expanded federal power to prosecute voting rights violations, clearly constitutional under the Fifteenth Amendment, elevated the Civil Rights Section in the Justice Department to divisional status, and created the United States Commission on Civil Rights.

215 Boynton v. Virginia, 364 U.S. 454 (1960); Barnes, Journey from Jim Crow, 144, 147.
Mixed Results

In the 1950s most African Americans were more likely to take bus and railroad transportation than they were airplanes. This pattern resulted more from class than racial considerations, given the higher costs of airplane travel. Those who did fly were not subjected to segregation aboard the airplane. Nevertheless, air passengers had to face segregation on the ground. The situation varied from place to place. The airport in Montgomery, Alabama required Jim Crow waiting rooms, but the one in Birmingham did not. The Jackson, Mississippi facility had a non-segregated waiting room, but restrooms and water fountains were restricted by race. Washington, D.C.’s National Airport had abolished segregated restaurants as early as 1948 under pressure from President Truman. He had responded to the complaints of several members, black and white, of his Presidential Committee on Civil Rights, who had experienced first-hand the indignities of segregated facilities in traveling in and out of Washington on government business. Indeed the situation became even more intolerable in the postwar world as non-white from African and Asians nations encountered the same Jim Crow treatment that African americans received. Indeed, the presidential committee’s report, To Secure These Rights, included in its far-reaching recommendations the passage of federal legislation to eradicate racial segregation in all public accommodations in the district.216 In contrast, eating facilities at Atlanta, Georgia and Greenville, South Carolina airports embraced Jim Crow throughout the 1950s. Not until 1960 did federal courts rule that restaurants and coffee shops that leased space from municipally run airports were barred from requiring segregation. The Dobbs House restaurant at the Atlanta airport quickly complied.217

Efforts to integrate public transportation since 1941 had resulted in important victories. The leading scholar of this struggle, Catherine A. Barnes, concluded that at the end of the 1950s “virtually all forms of Jim Crow transit had been outlawed, and considerable desegregation had gradually taken place.”218 Nevertheless, she pointed out that as one moved further south the chances of encountering Jim Crow in bus depots and train station waiting rooms and lunch counters skyrocketed despite favorable Supreme Court decisions and relentless black efforts.

During the 1950s, a number of northern and western states adopted legislation prohibiting discrimination in public accommodations. Joining the eighteen states with such laws already on the books were Oregon (1953), Montana (1955), New Mexico (1955), Vermont (1957), Maine (1957), Idaho (1959), and Alaska (1959). In 1961, New Hampshire, North Dakota, and Wyoming brought the total number of states with anti-segregations statutes up to twenty-eight. In addition, several cities in states that did not have public accommodations laws passed their own versions, including Wilmington, Delaware; Baltimore, Maryland; St. Louis and Kansas City, Missouri; and El Paso, Texas.219

216 Donald R. McCoy and Ronald T. Ruetten, Quest and Response: Minority Rights and the Truman Administration (Lawrence: University of Kansas Press, 1973), 91, 151-154; President’s Committee on Civil Rights, To Secure These Rights (Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1947), 171-172. The landmark report also urged congressional legislation banning racial discrimination in interstate transportation and passage by the states “of laws guaranteeing equal access to places of public accommodations, broadly defined, for persons of all races, colors, creeds, and national origins.” See 170.
217 Barnes, Journey, 137, 138, 140.
218 Ibid., 155.
Major League Baseball

In the decade after World War II, some of the most visible blows to racial segregation came on baseball diamonds. From 1947, when Jackie Robinson integrated the national pastime by playing for the Brooklyn Dodgers, until 1959, when Elijah “Pumpsie” Green joined the Boston Red Sox, the Major Leagues gradually abandoned Jim Crow. However, the players experienced integration to a greater extent on the field than off. During the 1950s, the worst problems existed in St. Louis, Baltimore, and Cincinnati, the franchises in the towns located furthest south. In Cincinnati, the Netherlands-Plaza hotel allowed blacks to stay, but required them to eat their meals in their rooms. Jackie Robinson, who had first broken the color barrier on the field, also pioneered in removing this irksome restriction. One evening he walked into the hotel’s dining room accompanied by his wife and not only received service but also signed an autograph for the waiter. At the Chase Hotel in St. Louis, black players could rent rooms, but they could not use dining rooms, swimming pools, or nightclubs. No matter in which city they stayed, baseball had an unwritten custom that forbade black and white teammates from rooming together. In northernmost cities, African American ball players usually faced fewer difficulties when spending time away from the ballpark.220

Black ball players encountered more difficulties during spring training in the South and playing for southern minor league teams before they moved up to the majors. Florida hosted the majority of spring training facilities and did not want to sacrifice this lucrative business. Consequently, the “Sunshine State” continued to welcome the teams on an integrated basis while the players remained on the field. Once outside the ballparks, however, players had to obey Jim Crow laws and customs with respect to public accommodations. This meant that African-American players could not room at the same hotels with their white counterparts and had to find lodging in black boardinghouses whose facilities did not match the more commodious whites-only hotels. Within the ball fields, dugouts were integrated but the stands were not, as blacks were sectioned off from whites. To avoid these nuisances, some teams relocated westward to Arizona for spring training. The Dodgers remained and built their own complex of playing fields and housing accommodations in Vero Beach, called Dodgertown. In 1961, the Major League Baseball Players Association urged the teams to take stronger action to integrate their training camps. Subsequently, the Yankees moved from St. Petersburg to Fort Lauderdale, which promised to provide desegregated facilities for their players. Stung by this defection and the financial losses it would bring, St. Pete dropped its racial prohibitions at Al Lang Field and its environs to accommodate the St. Louis Cardinals and the newly created New York Mets.221

The situation in the minors was even worse. In 1947, when Robinson hurdled the color bar into the majors, 175 towns and cities throughout the South had minor-league teams; however, no blacks played on them. Not until 1952 did a few blacks make it onto the team rosters, and by the end of the 1950s, a number of future stars, including Henry Aaron, were joining the previously segregated ranks. As with southern black residents in the communities they played, these athletes experienced the same racial discrimination in public accommodations. After the Deep South embarked on massive resistance, progress slowed as cities such as Birmingham outlawed integrated athletic contests. Segregationists fashioned a domino theory of race relations in sports: if baseball diamonds fell to integrated teams, other forms of segregation would topple. Black fans resorted to economic 220 Tygiel, Jackie Robinson, 311-313.

221 Ibid., 314-319.
boycotts against the exclusion of African-American players, which created severe financial hardship that forced some owners to capitulate. However, many others refused to let their financial interests interfere with their racism and went out of business. The Southern Association, which contained the Birmingham Barons, shut down in 1961 rather than accept black ball players. Not until 1964 were black ball players commonly accepted throughout the southern minor leagues.222

The Younger Generation and Early Sit-Ins

Most of the victories against Jim Crow had come through the courts in a slow, piecemeal fashion. The wartime direct-action campaigns of CORE and the Howard University students had not inaugurated a mass movement throughout the South; neither had the Montgomery bus boycott initiated widespread protest activities. Although African Americans continued to file lawsuits against racial discrimination, by the end of the 1950s a younger generation of blacks was preparing to confront Jim Crow head on but nonviolently.

In August 1958, Clara Luper, the adult advisor to the NAACP Youth Council in Oklahoma City, accompanied thirteen of its members to the Katz Drugstore, took seats at the whites-only lunch counter, and were turned down. Luper, a school teacher at Dunjee High School, had been influenced by Martin Luther King, Jr., and spent fifteen months planning sit-ins at five downtown stores—John A. Brown’s, Katz, Kress, Veazey’s Drug, and Greene’s Variety Store. The latter two agreed to desegregate voluntarily, and after three days of sit-ins from August 19 to 21, Katz’s capitulated. The students next turned to Kress, which served them standing up after removing the counter stools. Brown’s waited the demonstrators out until September when school resumed and the protests fizzled. The next few years saw additional protests, and the number of integrated eating facilities open to blacks rose to over 100.223

CORE sponsored similar attempts in Florida in 1959. Its Miami chapter, led by Dr. John Brown, a black physician and NAACP vice president, and Shirley Zoloth, the wife of a Jewish businessman, orchestrated sit-ins at variety-store lunch counters and Byrons-Jackson department store. They did not produce even the partial successes of those in Oklahoma City, and the protests quickly came to an end.224

In 1959, CORE joined the NAACP and the Interdenominational Ministers Council to wage an intensive campaign of demonstrations at segregated cafeterias, restaurants, hotels, and theatres in downtown Louisville, Kentucky. Ironically, the Brown Theatre barred African Americans from attending the showing of the all-black production of “Porgy and Bess.” These demonstrations were built upon direct-action protests against Jim Crow that had begun in 1956. They would continue on and off until 1963, when the city’s board of aldermen passed an ordinance “prohibiting racial discrimination in public business places.”225

222 Bruce Adelson, Brushing Back Jim Crow: The Integration of Minor-League Baseball in the American South (Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press, 1999), passim.
224 Meter and Rudwick, CORE, 90-91; Rabby, Pain and Promise, 83.
Just as Brown v. Board of Education showed that segregation existed in Topeka, Kansas, so too did sit-ins expose the presence of Jim Crow outside the South. The Sunflower State once again proved itself vulnerable, but this time it did not generate the publicity provided by Brown. On July 5, 1958, ten members of the NAACP Youth Council in Wichita sat-in at the downtown Dockum Drug Store, part of the Rexall chain, after they were denied service at the lunch counter. Protests continued through early August and caused the store to lose substantial profits. Consequently, the manager of Dockum announced that blacks could use all the facilities on a non-segregated basis.226

The Nashville Student Movement

These scattered sit-ins were a portent of a tidal wave of demonstrations that were about to wash over the South and change its landscape immeasurably. In late 1959, in Nashville, Tennessee, a group of students affiliated with Fisk University, Vanderbilt University, and the American Baptist Theological Seminary were carefully preparing a campaign to integrate the city’s segregated lunch counters. James Lawson, a Vanderbilt graduate student in Theology, a veteran of the Fellowship of Reconciliation, and a disciple of Gandhian nonviolent resistance, conducted workshops that attracted students such as Diane Nash, a Chicagoan attending Fisk, and John Lewis, from rural Alabama attending the Baptist Theological Seminary. For Nash, who unlike the Alabama-native Lewis journeyed from the North to attend college, the reality of southern segregation came as a shock. “I had a date with a young man,” she recalled, “and I started to go to the ladies’ room. And it said ‘white’ and ‘colored’, and I resented that. I was outraged.” Nash and Lewis created the Nashville Student Movement and attended Lawson’s Tuesday evening sessions held at Clark Memorial United Methodist Church near the Fisk campus, where the participants improvised role-playing techniques in rehearsal for the sit-ins planned for 1960. At these practice meetings, some students behaved as white ruffians and taunted others acting as peaceful demonstrators, thereby testing their ability to remain nonviolent in the face of verbal and physical abuse.227

Greensboro

However, before the Nashville Movement could get underway, students in Greensboro, North Carolina upstaged them. On February 1, 1960, four freshmen at North Carolina A & T walked into Woolworth’s on the corner of Elm and Market streets in downtown Greensboro. The five and dime store willingly sold its merchandise to black customers but refused to serve them at its lunch counter that stretched across the back and along one side of the store. According to plan, Joseph McNeal bought toothpaste and Franklin McCain purchased school supplies. They then joined David Richmond and Ezell Blair, Jr., who sat at the lunch counter and ordered a cup of coffee from a waitress who declined to serve them. The manager, C. L. Harris, soon closed the lunch counter. Over the next few days, scores of students poured into the downtown area to resume the demonstration at Woolworth’s and to try to integrate the lunch counter at the S.H. Kress store across the street from Woolworth’s, but to no avail.

Although the four A & T students had not planned their demonstration with the same degree of preparation as those in Nashville, their sit-in was spontaneous only in the sense that they had not plotted out the time and place of their venture more than a few days in advance. However, these demonstrations emerged out of a deeper community tradition in Greensboro, which fostered the questioning of Jim Crow. Two of the young men belonged to the city’s NAACP Youth Council, and two attended services at the Shiloh Baptist Church pastored by the Reverend Otis Hairston, an outspoken critic of white supremacy. They had also frequented the clothing establishment of Ralph Johns, a white gadfly who encouraged them to integrate Woolworth’s. They received further help from George Simkins, a black dentist and head of the adult NAACP chapter, who, after the initial demonstration, put out a call for CORE representatives to come to Greensboro and provide advice based on their first-hand experience with direct-action protests.228

The first week of demonstrations attracted black students from A & T, Bennett College, a private institution for African-American women, and Dudley High School as well as a handful of white students from the Women’s College of North Carolina and Guilford College, a Quaker school. After a week, the mayor, George Roach, negotiated a truce and set up a committee consisting of seven whites and one black, headed by city councilman E. R. Zane, to recommend a solution. When the Community Relations Committee failed to resolve the matter, demonstrations resumed on April 1. Woolworth’s closed its doors, but Kress stayed open and called in the police to arrest protesters on charges of trespassing. Undeterred, Greensboro blacks rallied around the students, waged a boycott against the stores, and set up picket lines outside them.229

Out of the limelight, the mayor’s committee continued to search for a resolution of the crisis. Working through the summer, Zane hammered out a deal that would integrate Woolworth’s, Kress, the Guilford Dairy Bar, and Meyer’s Luncheonette. On July 25, without fanfare and media coverage three, pre-selected, black Woolworth employees were served at the formerly off-limits lunch counter. Though restaurants and recreational accommodations remained segregated, Greensboro blacks had won an important victory beyond their ability to eat a hamburger at a variety store lunch counter. They had reconfigured the very definition of racial etiquette and discredited what whites deemed as appropriate African American behavior. As one student remarked: “Most whites think communications have broken down just because they’re getting a new message. We’ve known all along what they were thinking—now they’re learning what we think. And it doesn’t fit in with their pet myths.”230 Franklin McCain, one of the original Greensboro Four, explained how the protests had transformed him: “Seems like a lot of feelings of guilt or what-have-you suddenly left me, and I felt as though I had gained my manhood, so to speak, and not only gained it, but had developed quite a lot of respect for it.”231

229 Previously, Simkins had brought suit against Greensboro for operating a municipal golf course barred to blacks. After the city lost, it sold the golf course to a private club, which continued to exclude blacks. Richard Bardolph, ed., _The Civil Rights Record_ (New York: Thomas Crowell, 1970), 504.
230 Chafe, ibid., 89-94.
231 Wolff, _Lunch at the 5 & 10_, 151.
The Spread of the Sit-Ins

Unlike previous sit-ins in the 1940s and 1950s, the 1960 demonstrations spread like wildfire. Besides accounts in the media, news of the sit-ins passed quickly through word of mouth at sporting events involving athletes and fans from nearby black colleges as well as by operatives from CORE and the NAACP. The efforts that black students and adults had made since the end of World War II in building up existing organizations and creating new ones to challenge racial discrimination were finally paying off. As the sociologist Aldon Morris has noted: “The pre-existing internal organization enabled organizers to quickly disseminate the “sit-in” idea to groups already favorably exposed to direct action.” Within a few weeks of the Greensboro sit-ins, similar protests occurred in eleven cities in five states: North Carolina, Virginia, Florida, South Carolina, and Tennessee.

Nashville

Long-brewing demonstrations finally began in Nashville on February 18, 1960, as 200 students marched to the city’s downtown stores. These sit-ins led to physical attacks on the demonstrators, who remained true to their training in nonviolence. Yet scores of protesters were arrested on charges of disorderly conduct and trespassing. Violence escalated after the Greyhound bus terminal agreed to integrate its facilities and two unexploded bombs were found at the station. Z. Alexander Looby, the black attorney for the Nashville Movement, was not as fortunate when his house was bombed on April 19. In addition to a boycott timed to coincide with the Easter shopping season, Diane Nash led a march of 2,500 students to city hall. There she confronted Mayor Ben West and challenged him to explain the morality of the policy that allowed blacks to shop in a variety store but denied them the right to eat at its food counter. West, keenly aware of the losses suffered by the business community as a result of the boycott and demonstrations, conceded that lunch counter segregation was wrong. Consequently, on May 10, six Nashville stores opened their eating facilities to African Americans. As in Greensboro, however, theatres, hotels, and restaurants remained segregated.

Knoxville

From Nashville the sit-ins stretched to Knoxville. Robert Booker, a student at Knoxville College, a Presbyterian black school, went along with one of his white teachers, Merrill Proudfoot, to obtain lunch at Rich’s department store. Denied service, the students tried Walgreen’s and Grant’s with a similar outcome. They carried signs underlining the contradiction of the U. S. waging a Cold War for freedom against the Soviets abroad while condoning racial inequality at home. Referring to the Soviet premier who had visited the U.S. two years earlier, one poster read: “Khrushchev Could Eat Here, I Can’t.” Ministers played an important role in convening meetings at the Tabernacle Baptist Church and Mt. Zion Baptist Church to maintain solidarity and discipline. At Walgreen’s a white heckler poured Coca Cola over Proudfoot’s head and struck him, but the college professor remained nonviolent. Protesters beefed up their demonstrations with the initiation of a selective buying campaign, which hit downtown businesses hard in their pocketbooks. Finally, after several months of confrontations and negotiations, on July 18, Woolworth’s, Kress’s, McClellan’s, Grant’s, and Walgreen’s opened their lunch counters to blacks.

233 Williams, Eyes, 132-138.
234 Merrill Proudfoot, Diary of a Sit-In (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1990), passim.
Baltimore

One of the most successful, early sit-ins took place in Baltimore, Maryland. Like nearby Washington, D.C., Baltimore was a border-state city that shared southern racial practices in public accommodations. However, unlike locations further south, blacks, who compose a third of the city’s population, did not encounter segregation on trains and buses. They could also vote and had elected blacks to the city council and state legislature. During the 1950s some progress had been made as CORE led sit-ins to desegregate downtown variety-store lunch counters, and students from Morgan State College, a black school, desegregated lunch counters at the Read Drug chain store in Northwood shopping center, located a mile from the college. By the time of the Greensboro demonstrations, the main public accommodations still segregated consisted of beauty shops, restaurants, and the women’s apparel sections of department stores. In 1960, Morgan College students, organized under the banner of the Civic Interest Group, conducted protests at the Hecht-May store restaurant in Northwood and at Hutzler’s department store restaurant. The disciplined group of students and their allies attracted a good deal of support from both black and white communities. After three weeks of demonstrations, the department stores capitulated and abandoned segregation, pursuing their own best economic reasons for reaching a solution.235

Tampa

Further south in Tampa, Florida, on February 29, black high school students organized by the NAACP Youth Council and led by its president Clarence Fort, launched a sit-in against downtown Woolworth’s and Kress’s lunch counters. In other cities in the Sunshine State, most notably Jacksonville and Tallahassee, sit-ins had led to arrests, violent attacks, and proved fruitless. However, Tampa showed more restraint. The mayor, Julian Lane, appointed a biracial committee to mediate the dispute, and its black and white representatives worked out a deal to integrate the variety-store lunch counters. On September 14, six and one-half months after the sit-ins began, teams of carefully selected blacks were served at eighteen establishments without any trouble.236

Atlanta

Four hundred miles north of Tampa, protesters encountered more difficulty and generated greater publicity. On February 4, a few days after the Greensboro sit-ins commenced, Julian Bond and Lonnie King met at Yates and Milton’s Drugstore near the campus of Atlanta University, where they were students, and planned to launch similar protests. After a declaration of their goals appeared in local newspapers, 200 students protested at segregated facilities in City Hall, the State Capitol, Fulton County Courthouse, and the city’s train and bus stations, resulting in the arrests of nearly eighty including Bond. Following a cooling-off period, the students resumed their protests in mid October in the midst of the final weeks of the 1960 presidential election. They convinced Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., who had moved to Atlanta from Montgomery, to join them in their attempt to integrate the restaurant facilities at downtown Rich’s Department Store. On October 19, Dr. King and his student companions were rebuffed at a snack bar in the covered bridge that connected the two wings of the store on both ends of Forsyth Street. From there, King and the demonstrators went up to the sixth floor of Rich’s to try to eat in the store’s fancy Magnolia Room. Once again denied service, this time they were arrested for trespassing.

This action precipitated a chain of events that affected the outcome of the 1960 election. King, who was on probation for a minor traffic violation, was sent to the state penitentiary at Reidsville, a facility for hardened criminals. Advisors to Democratic presidential candidate John F. Kennedy persuaded him to call King’s wife, Coretta, and offer sympathy for her husband’s plight; more importantly, the candidate’s brother and campaign manager, Robert, pulled strings with state Democratic officials to get a judge to release King. John Kennedy’s Republican opponent, Richard M. Nixon, though concerned about King, refused to intervene. For his intervention, Kennedy won a small but significant increase of black voters over what the losing Democratic nominee, Adlai Stevenson, had received in 1956, just enough to provide the margin of victory as Kennedy won by less than .3 percent of the popular vote.237

The King episode may have thrust Kennedy into the White House, but it did not bring an immediate end to lunch counter segregation in Atlanta. The sit-ins resumed the following year on February 1, 1961, the anniversary of Greensboro. White and black business, civic, and religious leaders, including Martin Luther King, Jr.’s father, urged the student demonstrators to suspend their protests until desegregation of the schools was implemented in the fall. They did not want the protests to heighten racial tensions that might interfere with school integration. On March 10, Dr. King persuaded the students to hold off and give their elders’ plan a chance to work. In this instance patience was rewarded, and on September 27, 1961 Atlanta saw its lunch counters desegregated.238

Atlanta demonstrated the limits of moderation in achieving swift results. Even more so than in cities like Tampa and Greensboro, Atlanta prided itself as the “City Too Busy to Hate,” and had forged a biracial coalition of civic and business leaders to head off conflicts between the black and white communities. City fathers (few women occupied high positions among the political and corporate elite) preferred the gradual pace of litigation and negotiation to direct-action protests and did what they could to contain them. This approach generally assured racial peace, but it did not guarantee desegregation. Established black leaders such as the attorney A. T. Walden, life insurance executive E. M. Martin, and the Reverend Martin Luther King, Sr., cooperated with Mayors William Hartsfield and Ivan Allen to achieve desegregation incrementally and incompletely. A lawsuit brought desegregation to the city’s golf courses in 1955, and black leaders eschewed a Montgomery-style bus boycott and waged a decorous, two-year legal battle to achieve bus integration in 1959. Fearing instability and violence that could threaten potential business investment, influential blacks and whites reigned in the student-led sit-ins, as noted earlier. Despite some success at the lunch counters, as late as 1964, Atlanta had desegregated only one in ten restaurants and three of 150 motels and hotels.239 Although cooperation between black and white elites tamped down the flames of racial discord, it would take the force of federal legislation eventually to eradicate Jim Crow public accommodations.

238 Oppenheimer, Sit-in Movement, 133, 137, 139; Sitkoff, The Struggle for Black Equality, 81.
239 Fairclough, To Redeem, 43, 175-177.
First-Year Results

The sociologist Martin Oppenheimer has calculated that in the first year after Greensboro demonstrations took place in 104 communities. In sixty-nine of them, the protests turned out favorably, and in twenty-nine they proved unsuccessful. Overall, he computed a 56.5 percent success rate. In March 1961, CORE reported a higher scorecard of progress. According to the organization’s figures, 138 communities had agreed to some measure of integrated facilities since February 1, 1960. Still, Oppenheimer and CORE agreed that the results were highly uneven. Segregation remained intact in the Deep South states of Alabama, Arkansas, Louisiana, South Carolina, Mississippi, and Georgia (before Atlanta integrated in late 1961). Not for lack of trying did segregation prevail. Protests in Orangeburg, Rock Hill, and Columbia, South Carolina, New Orleans and Baton Rouge, Louisiana, and Montgomery, Alabama ended unsuccessfully.240

Mississippi Gulf Coast

Nowhere in the South was Jim Crow more entrenched than in Mississippi. During the 1950s, blacks had endured a regimen of state-sponsored violence and intimidation to maintain white supremacy. In 1955, George Lee and Lamar Smith were murdered as a result of their efforts to expand the right to vote, and Emmett Till, a fourteen-year-old youth from Chicago, was brutally killed for allegedly flirting with a white woman. Four years later, Mack Charles Parker was lynched after he supposedly raped a white woman. Politicians openly joined the White Citizens’ Council, an organization formed in Mississippi in 1955 that spread throughout the South to subvert the Brown decision. Composed of respectable businessmen and civic leaders, the organization’s members fired black employees and refused blacks credit if they sought to exercise their constitutional rights. In 1956, the state legislature created the Mississippi State Sovereignty Commission, an agency that spied on and intimidated blacks and worked with the Citizen’s Council and local officials to preserve racial segregation. What these groups did not accomplish, the Ku Klux Klan did so through terror and violence. Chronicling this pattern of racial repression, James W. Silver, a History Professor at the University of Mississippi, astutely called the Magnolia State “the closed society.”241

Yet even Mississippi was not immune from protests. On May 14, 1959, Gilbert Mason, an African-American physician from Biloxi, led a group of eight blacks, including five children, to swim in the lovely Gulf Coast waters near his home. A policeman forced the swimmers out, informing them that a municipal ordinance prevented blacks from using the beach reserved exclusively for whites. In fact, no such law existed, but local authorities along with private developers and homeowners insisted on barring blacks from the stretch of beaches running from Biloxi to Gulfport. The thirty-year-old Dr. Mason, a graduate of Howard University Medical School, refused to back down. Because of the area’s attraction as a popular tourist spot, the presence of lucrative shipbuilding and seafood industries, the existence of Keesler Air Force Base, the Navy Construction Battalion Center, and two Veterans Administration hospitals, blacks believed that conditions were right for winning concessions from whites who did not want racial conflict to interfere with business opportunities.242

240 Oppenheimer, Sit-in Movement, 177-179; Barnes, Journey, 143; Fairclough, Race and Democracy, 267-270, 272-276.
As a leader of the Harrison County Civic Action Committee, Mason petitioned local authorities to provide blacks with equal access to the beaches, but to no avail. He not only had to contend with intransigent municipal officials but also with the Sovereignty Commission, which sent agents to investigate his background and undermine his efforts. As part of its plan, the Commission secretly collaborated with one of Mason’s colleagues on the Civic Action Committee, Felix Dunn, a Gulfport physician and head of the local NAACP chapter, who provided information about the protesters and assured officials that blacks only wanted a segregated beach. Besides his medical practice, Dunn had clandestine business dealings with white businessmen and local officials that he did not want upset by racial confrontations and white retaliation.243

Undeterred by these obstacles, on April 24, 1960, Mason orchestrated a “wade-in” of some 125 black men, women, and children at the beaches near Biloxi. The peaceful demonstration spawned a riot as a mob of white segregationists wielding lead pipes, blackjacks, pool cues, chains, and guns attacked the swimmers, causing serious injury to approximately fifteen blacks. When an interracial group of soldiers from Keesler Air Force Base attempted to shield some elderly blacks from the mob, they too were assaulted. The police arrested twenty-four people, twenty-two of them African Americans, including Mason, who had also been attacked and beaten by a white man. Mason subsequently broke with Dunn, who had not participated in the wade-in, and formed a separate chapter of the NAACP in Biloxi, a branch that received support from both Medgar Evers, the head of the Mississippi NAACP, and Roy Wilkins, the executive secretary of the national association. Despite these pioneering efforts, the Gulf Coast beaches remained segregated, and the controversy moved into the courts. Nevertheless, this local challenge to Jim Crow and the grassroots adaptation of the sit-in tactic opened the way for new and continuing challenges against segregation over the next several years in Mississippi and the rest of the South.244

Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee

Though only partially successful, the sit-ins brought a younger generation of African-American women and men into the movement, which stimulated efforts to challenge all forms of segregation head on. Leading the way was the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), which attracted some of the best, brightest, and most courageous black and white young people. Created in the wake of the sit-ins in April 1960 at Shaw University, a black college in Raleigh, North Carolina, SNCC was committed to nonviolent, direct-action protest that allowed its practitioners to bear moral witness to the evils of segregation and by peaceful actions lead to its destruction. SNCC also viewed voter registration as a means of organizing local communities to challenge white supremacy in all its manifestations. Over the next half-decade SNCC fieldworkers entered some of the most perilous places in the Deep South to combat Jim Crow.245

243 Ibid., 134, note 56. Dunn’s role is disputed. Mason believed that Dunn was something of a double agent, working to mislead the Commission. J. Michael Butler, however, from his study of recently released Sovereignty Commission records, contends that Dunn was an informer.
244 Ibid., 126, 129, 131, 137. On June 23, 1963, Mason led another wade-in with similar results. Police arrested seventy-one protesters and kept white-initiated violence to a much lower level than in 1960. Not until July 31, 1972 did the federal courts resolve the issue. Former Governor, James P. Coleman, who had helped establish the Sovereignty Commission and was serving on the federal court of appeals, ruled that Harrison County officials had taken federal disaster funds from federal officials in Washington after a 1947 hurricane and in doing so, Mississippi agreed to ensure that the beaches would be open to the public, which included African Americans. See 140, 142, 143.
Diane Nash was one of the student leaders that helped give birth to SNCC. The national leadership of the civil rights movement centered on strong men, but women such as Nash, played a huge rule that men could not deny. According to Nash, “I ran into some real problems in terms of being the only woman at the stage when we were just setting SNCC up as an organization. It was really rough not being just one of the guys. They did tend to look at me that way. However, they had to tolerate me because I had such a strong local base in Nashville, and at that time I had gotten probably more publicity than any other student in the movement.”

Although SNCC became the vanguard for a younger generation of African Americans pursuing racial equality, it derived a great deal of inspiration and direction from veteran civil rights activists. Born in 1903 in Norfolk, Virginia, Ella Baker had lived in Harlem during the Great Depression and organized economic cooperatives to relieve black poverty. During the 1940s, she served as director of branches for the NAACP and toured the South helping to promote Youth Councils, including one in Greensboro from which the 1960 sit-ins would emerge. In the mid-1960s, she was instrumental in launching the SCLC and served briefly as its executive director. In that position, she encouraged sit-in activists to assemble at her alma mater of Shaw University and urged them to form their own organization independent of existing groups. As noted above, SNCC grew out of this gathering. Miss Baker, as she was respectfully called by the youthful SNCC members, from the very beginning envisioned the sit-ins as something “bigger than a hamburger or even a giant-sized Coke.” She viewed these demonstrations as the opening wedge “to rid America of the scourge of racial segregation—not only at lunch counters, but in every aspect of life.”

SNCC reflected Baker’s approach to fighting for social change. She had never felt comfortable within the bureaucratic organizational structure of the NAACP, which placed a premium on leadership from the top down and on hierarchical decision making. Nor had she flourished within the SCLC, which depended on the charismatic style of one great leader—Dr. King. In both organizations, women took a back seat to men, especially in the SCLC where strong-minded ministers reigned. Instead, Baker wished to seek out leadership at the community level and rely on ordinary men and women to shape their own destinies. In the young people of SNCC she discovered and nurtured kindred ideological spirits. Baker found its grassroots perspective and group-centered leadership “refreshing indeed to those of the older generation who bear the scars of the battle, the frustrations and the disillusionment that come when the prophetic leader turns out to have heavy feet of clay.” When SNCC members quarreled about whether to concentrate on direct-action demonstrations to topple segregation or focus on the presumably less confrontational drives to increase voter registration, Baker gently prompted them to undertake both, which they did.

Another woman who exerted a great deal of influence on young people in the movement was Septima Clark. Born in Charleston, South Carolina in 1898, Clark made her greatest impact on the civil rights movement through her work in citizenship education. Active in both the NAACP and the YWCA, Clark was fired from her teaching job for protesting South Carolina’s attempt after the Brown case to persecute blacks who belonged to civil rights groups. She soon became director of workshops at the Highlander Folk School in Monteagle, Tennessee, an institution that recruited labor and community leaders of both races to come together and explore techniques for social reform. In early 1955, one of her “students” was Rosa Parks. In 1960, Clark earmarked her educational forums at Highlander to facilitate the activities of the sit-in demonstrators. In synchronicity with Baker’s teaching to build leadership from the bottom up, Clark brought Baker to Highlander to conduct educational workshops with her.249

---

Many of the women and men who participated in the movement had attended workshops at Highlander. Established in 1932 by Myles Horton, a native-born Tennessean, a graduate of Union Theological Seminary in New York City, and a democratic socialist, the facility opened its doors originally to help the impoverished of southern Appalachia through political organizing and cultural education. Not a school in any traditional sense, Highlander provided education to oppressed adults seeking to change their material and social conditions. During the 1930s, it worked closely with organized labor to pursue its goals. A decade before Brown, Highlander supported school desegregation, and throughout the 1950s and 1960s, conducted interracial workshops for teachers and civic leaders, including Rosa Parks, in community organizing, citizenship training, and nonviolent protest. Highlander came under frequent attack because of its work with unions and civil rights causes. White southern reactionaries branded it the “Communist Training School,” and in the mid 1950s circulated widely a photograph of Martin Luther King, Jr. at one of its sessions. In 1961, the state legislature revoked the school’s charter and forced it to reorganize and move from Monteagle to Knoxville, Tennessee. Since then, it has relocated to New Market, Tennessee, where it still operates, having resumed its original goal to help Appalachia’s poor people.250

The Freedom Rides II

This emphasis on participatory democracy encouraged great innovation and flexibility in SNCC. For example, the group played a crucial role in the historic Freedom Rides of 1961. However, the idea was originally conceived and implemented not by SNCC but by CORE. In April 1961, James Farmer, the Executive Director of CORE, advised the White House, Justice Department, and the FBI of his group’s intention of sending two teams of interracial freedom riders on buses from Washington, D. C. to New Orleans. They sought to test whether the recent Boynton decision was being enforced in bus station facilities in the South, and alerted Washington to the possibility of trouble. No federal official replied to Farmer’s communications. Fourteen years earlier CORE had sponsored the Journey of Reconciliation, and James Peck, one of the passengers participating in that trip, was on board on this one as well. As difficult as the 1947 excursion had proved to be, the danger to the current riders was greater because they would travel further south through Alabama and Mississippi where civil rights activists encountered the greatest resistance from whites.251

On May 4, seven blacks and six whites broke up into two interracial groups and boarded a Trailways and a Greyhound bus out of the nation’s capital to begin what Farmer proclaimed, as “putting the movement on wheels.”252 For the most part the journey proceeded uneventfully, though the riders

251 Farmer, Lay Bare, 197-98.
252 Sitkoff, Struggle, 100.
did encounter occasional harassment. One of the passengers, Charles Perkins, was arrested in Charlotte, North Carolina after he was turned down for a shoeshine and refused to leave. A day later, on May 9 in Rock Hill, South Carolina, white onlookers beat John Lewis, the Nashville student and SNCC member, along with Albert Bigelow, a white pacifist, as they tried to enter a white waiting room. In Winnsboro, South Carolina, police arrested Peck and Henry Thomas, a Howard University student, when they attempted to eat at a white lunch counter. No further incidents occurred the rest of the way as the two buses rolled through the Palmetto State and through Georgia.

The relatively tranquil experience was about to end with a fury. On May 14, Mother’s Day Sunday, as the Greyhound bus journeyed into Anniston, Alabama, a crowd of enraged whites intercepted the vehicle, smashed its windows and slashed the tires. The police came to the rescue and freed the bus, enabling it to escape the city. However, about six miles out of town, the bus stopped as its tires went flat. The mob caught up with the disabled Greyhound, and someone hurled a firebomb through a broken window into the bus. As the riders hastily departed from the vehicle that was about to burst into flames, the terrorists pummeled them. Members of Reverend Fred Shuttlesworth’s Alabama Christian Movement for Human Rights (ACMHR) of Birmingham, rescued the besieged passengers, put them in cars, and drove them to Birmingham. When the Trailways bus reached Anniston, the violence again flared. A group of eight whites jumped on the bus and demanded that the black passengers sit in the back. As they forced the blacks into the rear, two whites, James Peck and Walter Bergman, tried to intervene. For their efforts, the white thugs beat the two. Somehow the bus managed to resume the trip, but when it pulled into Birmingham a mob of some forty whites greeted the arriving passengers with an attack that left Peck with a head wound, which required fifty-three stitches, and Walter Bergman, a sixty-year-old retired professor from the University of Michigan, with serious brain damage. The city’s commissioner of public safety, the notorious Eugene “Bull” Connor, had advance warning of the impending mob attack, but he permitted the brutality to persist for an agonizing fifteen minutes until he finally allowed law enforcement officials to intervene.

Although the besieged riders wanted to continue on their journey, the bus companies refused to furnish drivers for fear of further violence. Instead, the riders boarded an airplane, arranged by the Justice Department, and on May 17, flew to their final destination of New Orleans. The Department, which James Farmer had contacted before the rides began, had been monitoring this interstate journey. The last thing Attorney General Kennedy wanted was an outburst of racial trouble that would put his brother’s administration in an unfavorable light both at home and abroad. Not for the last time, he hoped to defuse the explosive situation.

At this juncture, Diane Nash and the SNCC group in Nashville contacted Farmer and promised to send volunteers into Birmingham to resume the ride. She feared that the movement would suffer a serious blow if it allowed white violence to deter it. Farmer consented, and Nash assembled a new band of SNCC members, including John Lewis and Henry Thomas from the original contingent, to head for Birmingham. When the group of eight blacks and two whites arrived, they were arrested and placed into “protective custody.” The next day Bull Connor personally drove them to the Alabama border with Tennessee and dropped them off in the middle of nowhere. The group managed to call Nash, who sent a car to return them to Birmingham. Once there, they tried to take a

---

253 Ibid., 100-101; Farmer, Lay Bare, 199-200.
254 Sitkoff, Struggle, 101-02; Farmer, Lay Bare, 202-03.
Greyhound bus, but again the company would not provide a driver. Attorney General Robert Kennedy intervened--“Get in touch with Mr. Greyhound,” he ordered--and the company complied. On May 20, the bus carried twenty-one passengers to Montgomery, including fresh SNCC recruits from Nashville and Atlanta. Arriving into the Greyhound terminal, the state police caravan accompanying the bus on this leg of its journey dispersed, and as the passengers disembarked, a mob chased and brutally attacked them. In the ensuing melee, John Lewis suffered a head wound, Jim Zwerg, a white volunteer, was beaten to a pulp, and John Siegenthaler, a Justice Department observer who was trying to assist two female riders, was knocked unconscious by a man wielding a pipe.

Appalled by this new round of violence and concerned by the unfavorable publicity generated throughout the world by this bloody incident, the Kennedy Administration sent some 400 U.S. marshals to Montgomery and worked behind-the-scenes to negotiate a settlement. Meanwhile, on May 21, Martin Luther King, who had not been involved in the planning or direction of the Freedom Rides, arrived in Montgomery and spoke before a crowd packed into Ralph Abernathy’s First Baptist Church. Outside white mobs formed, assaulted black onlookers, torched parked cars, and flung rocks and Molotov Cocktails at the church. Meanwhile, Dr. King kept in telephone communication with Attorney General Kennedy, who monitored the crisis. U.S. marshals fought to repel the siege, fired tear gas into the crowd, but were outnumbered. As gas fumes wafted inside the house of worship, Dr. King called for calm to allay the mounting sense of anxiety. Finally, Governor John Patterson, a segregationist who had denounced the riders as rabble rousers, but was under intense pressure from the federal government, declared martial law and sent in the National Guard to restore order and free the churchgoers.

With President Kennedy about to leave for Vienna, Austria for a face-to-face meeting with Nikita Khrushchev, Attorney General Kennedy urged SNCC and CORE to consent to “a cooling off period” to forestall further disturbances that would embarrass the U.S. The chief executive, like Eisenhower and Truman before him, was acutely aware of the embarrassment racial conflicts caused the United States in its Cold War propaganda battles with the Soviet Union. Newspapers abroad headlined America’s racial violence and played into the hands of the Soviets, who proclaimed Americans as hypocritical in preaching the virtues of democracy while condemning the Russians for violating human rights. The civil rights forces had no intention of rescuing the government from its propaganda nightmare and declined to call off the rides.

Rebuffed, the attorney general finally worked out an agreement for Alabama state troopers to protect the bus riders on the next leg of their trip and then have Mississippi authorities escort them to Jackson. Once safely there, city officials would have them peacefully arrested, tried, and convicted for violating the state’s segregation laws. All went according to plan, but at the expense of Freedom Riders who continued to pour into Jackson throughout the summer and fill the cells at the state penitentiary. To forestall bloodshed, the Kennedy Administration had been willing to ignore temporarily the Boynton decision and accede to state segregationists. On May 29, Attorney General Kennedy had petitioned the ICC to promulgate regulations banning interstate bus segregation. The 256 Sitkoff, Struggle, 102-05; Williams, Eyes, 153 (for the Kennedy quote); Branch, Parting the Waters, 443.

257 David Garrow, Bearing the Cross, 157-158.
Freedom Rides maintained pressure on the administration and the commission, and finally in late September the ICC issued a decree declaring that by November 1, 1961 interstate as well as intrastate bus carriers and terminals must abandon segregation. By the end of 1961, CORE reported that it had surveyed 200 bus stations in the South and discovered that most obeyed the ICC regulation. The majority of recalcitrant operators were located in Mississippi and northern Louisiana, but by the end of 1962 legal action had dismantled much of the remaining segregated terminal facilities.259

President Kennedy, the Cold War, and African Diplomats

The Cold War concerns that worried the Kennedy Administration during the Freedom Rides carried over into other delicate matters. By the time Kennedy entered the White House, twenty-five former European colonies in Africa had won their independence, and over the next three years an additional eight took their place beside them. For the president who had declared that the United States faced the hour of maximum danger in its struggle with the Soviet Union, winning support from these newly emancipated nations was critical in its diplomatic jousts with the Soviets within organizations such as the United Nations. Racial discrimination interfered with the ability of the U.S. to present its case for democracy and capitalism without appearing to be hypocritical. Secretary of State Dean Rusk frankly admitted: “Stories of racial discrimination in the United States and discriminatory treatment accorded diplomats from the many newly independent countries of the old colonial empires began to undermine our relations with these countries.”260

The most vexing problem in this respect concerned the treatment non-white African officials received while traveling along Maryland’s Highway 40, which they rode en route from the U.N. in New York City to Washington, D.C. On numerous occasions, the diplomats stopped for a meal at a Maryland restaurant, which denied them service as it did for African Americans. Brought to the attention of President Kennedy, he initially remarked; “Tell these ambassadors I wouldn’t think of driving from New York to Washington. Tell them to fly!”261 Nevertheless, the Kennedy Administration did try to tackle the problem. The Office of Special Protocol Services within the State Department took the unusual step of sending its director, Pedro Sanjuan, to testify before the Maryland Legislature in support of a public accommodations bill under consideration. Normally, state legislatures did not hear from State Department officials in the course of their duties. However, Sanjuan made it clear that the struggle for racial democracy within Maryland was explicitly linked to the country’s ability to conduct the Cold War. “GIVE US THE WEAPONS TO CONDUCT THIS WAR ON HUMAN DIGNITY,” [emphasis in original], he insisted, which the battle against Communism demanded.262 Despite initial reluctance, Maryland adopted a public accommodations law in January 1963, thereby assisting American citizens of color and non-white foreigners alike and providing more ammunition for the nation’s Cold War propaganda arsenal.

The Southern Christian Leadership Conference and Albany, Georgia

Meanwhile, Cold War imperatives did not have much impact further south in Albany, Georgia, located in the southwestern portion of the state. On November 1, 1961, the day the Interstate Commerce Commission’s desegregation order went into effect, Charles Sherrod and Cordell Reagan

259 Barnes, Journey, 178.
261 Dudziak, Cold War, 168.
262 Ibid., 169.
of SNCC went to the Trailways bus terminal to see if it had fallen into line. Joined by black students affiliated with the NAACP Youth Council, they entered the waiting room designated for whites only and were told to leave by the police, which they did. Three weeks later, three high school student members of the Youth Council returned to the bus station and were arrested after they refused to leave the segregated area. That same afternoon, two undergraduates from Albany State College, a black institution, were also arrested for disobeying the police order to leave the premises. They had ignored the college dean’s pronouncement to avoid trouble and were subsequently suspended. By this time, local black activists had formed the Albany Movement, which convened mass meetings at Mount Zion and Shiloh Baptist Churches. At these gatherings the spirit of freedom rang out as the congregations sang rousing freedom songs, which fired up their courage to persist in protest. Over the next several weeks demonstrations continued and spread to the town’s Central Railway Terminal, as an interracial group of freedom riders arrived from Atlanta. The police arrested over 500 protesters, and police chief Laurie Pritchett declared: “We can’t tolerate the NAACP or the SNCC or any other nigger organization [taking] over this town.”

Pritchett, nevertheless, shrewdly tried to avoid the kind of ugly incidents that had accompanied the Freedom Riders in Alabama and cultivated favor with representatives of the news media for seemingly acting with restraint.

With the jails filling up and protests stalled, the head of the Albany Movement, William Anderson, invited Dr. King and the SCLC to intervene. SNCC members, however, had doubts about bringing in King. In contrast to SNCC’s methodical organizing approach, the SCLC depended upon entering a community and quickly mobilizing its residents to engage in public demonstrations to draw national attention to their plight. SNCC feared that its own careful efforts to develop local leadership would become overshadowed by the powerful presence of the charismatic Dr. King. They fretted that the focus of the protests would be placed upon him rather than on the people who had to live in the community once King and his staff departed. SNCC field workers contended that they would then have to redouble their efforts to build local leadership. They wanted ordinary citizens to believe that they could make their own social change without the direction of a single, powerful, personality. Some SNCC personnel even had begun to refer derisively to the SCLC head as “De Lawd.” Nevertheless, there was little that SNCC could do, because the local folks they counted on were the ones who had summoned King in the first place.

Some of SNCC’s concerns materialized. On December 15, King gave an inspirational sermon at Shiloh Baptist, and the following day, he along with Anderson and Ralph Abernathy led a march of 250 people to City Hall, where they were arrested. King and his companions refused bail, but they soon agreed to provide bond after the city consented to abide by the ICC ruling. However, once King departed from Albany, municipal authorities cancelled the agreement, preferring to get the civil rights leader to leave town rather than uphold their word. During January 1962, protests resumed accompanied by numerous arrests, as students and SNCC followers demonstrated that transportation facilities remained segregated. A boycott against local buses forced the company out of business in three weeks, but did not bring any integration.

In February, King returned to stand trial on charges stemming from his December arrest; he was found guilty. The judge delayed his sentencing until July, when King and Abernathy received a sentence of forty-five days in jail or payment of a $178 fine. They chose jail. After three days, the SCLC leaders were released as city officials secretly arranged to have their fine paid in hope of once again sending King packing. This time, however, the civil rights leader stayed, and President Kennedy rebuked Albany officials for failing to negotiate with him and his supporters, remarking at a national news conference: “The U.S. government is involved in sitting down at Geneva with the Soviet Union. I can’t understand why the . . . city council of Albany . . . can’t do the same for American citizens.”265 Despite these sharp presidential words, Pritchett and Albany leaders had outfoxed the movement and taught it a valuable lesson. As long as segregationists reacted to black protest with perceived restraint, they could influence public opinion and keep the White House from interfering in their local affairs. In turn, civil rights activists learned from Albany that they could only mobilize the force of the federal government by creating crises that led to the breakdown of law and order.

263 For the Pritchett quote, Williams, Eyes, 168; Branch, Parting the Waters, 530-532.
264 Williams, Eyes, 169-170.

Albany was no more inclined to heed the president’s wishes than it was to respond positively to peaceful black protests. Demonstrations and arrests continued throughout July without any sign of the city being willing to negotiate in good faith. One especially nasty incident provoked blacks to forgo nonviolence and to retaliate. On July 24, Mrs. Slater King, wife of one of the Albany Movement’s leaders, appeared at the Camilla jail to bring food for some friends who had been arrested. Pregnant and with two small children in hand, Mrs. King was ordered to leave, but before she could respond was pushed to the ground. She subsequently suffered a miscarriage. In protest of Mrs. King’s treatment, 2,000 blacks marched through downtown Albany. The police tried to head them off and some of the blacks hurled rocks, bricks, and bottles at them. Upset by this breach in nonviolence, Dr. King (who was not related to Slater King) proclaimed a “Day of Penance,” and on July 26, he conducted a peaceful prayer vigil at City Hall, which resulted in his and Abernathy’s arrest. After spending two weeks in jail, King departed from Albany having failed to achieve his or the movement’s specific goals. The city proclaimed victory, closed its parks rather than allow integration, and permitted blacks into its library only after removing all the chairs. Clearly, neither Dr. King nor SNCC had the right tactics to break down segregation that was powerfully and cleverly enforced. Yet some successes simply could not be counted in traditional ways. The demonstrations, William Anderson explained, had transformed Albany blacks and their children and “they would never accept segregated society as it was before.”266 In fact, SNCC organizers such as Charles Sherrod remained in the area and pursued the struggle for equality throughout the decade.

Robert F. Williams and Armed Self Defense

In contrast to Dr. King’s commitment to nonviolent protest in Albany, Robert F. Williams offered an alternative in Monroe, North Carolina. A Korean War veteran, Williams headed an NAACP branch in this small town just outside of Charlotte. However, Williams did not subscribe to the philosophy of nonviolence. Instead, he organized a rifle club to defend blacks from assaults by the Ku Klux Klan chapter active in the area. After an all-white jury failed to convict a white man charged with raping a pregnant black woman in 1959, an angry Williams called upon blacks to use self-defense to fight “violence with violence.” Although the NAACP suspended him for his remarks, Williams continued to lead the movement against white supremacy under the banner of the Monroe Non-Violent Action Committee.

Amid escalating tensions, in 1961, some SNCC Freedom Riders, including the organization’s executive secretary James Forman, joined Williams in a campaign against a segregated swimming
The situation turned ugly as white mobs and black demonstrators clashed. Williams tried to promote calm at the same time as he stocked his house with weapons for protection. When a white couple innocently wandered into his neighborhood during the disturbances, he sheltered them and released them unharmed. Nevertheless, North Carolina authorities charged him with kidnapping the couple, and to avoid prosecution and escape what he thought would be an unjust trial, Williams fled the country to live first in Cuba and then China. He remained abroad for the duration of the 1960s, but his call for blacks to arm themselves would gain a warm reception from African Americans increasingly disillusioned with nonviolence as a tactic in the battle for black liberation.\footnote{Timothy B. Tyson, Radio Free Dixie: Robert F. Williams and the Origins of Black Power (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1999), 268-281.}

Birmingham

Notwithstanding the progress to desegregate public transportation and lunch counters, as the experiences in Albany, Georgia and Monroe, North Carolina underscored, by 1963, fierce resistance to racial equality persisted, especially in the Deep South. So far, movement leaders had learned that neither protests nor judicial rulings alone could break the back of Jim Crow. Such a Herculean task required black activists to provoke crises that pressured the federal government to abolish racial apartheid once and for all. Birmingham, Alabama provided the opportunity to orchestrate this scenario.

Known as “Bombingham” because of the numerous explosions ignited by white supremacists to repel black advancement, the city remained completely segregated, an American Johannesburg, South Africa. For years the Reverend Fred Shuttlesworth, a leader of SCLC, and the ACMHR, an affiliate of the SCLC, had led demonstrations to integrate schools and public accommodations with no success. The pastor of Bethel Baptist Church, the undaunted Shuttlesworth had paid for his activities by enduring personal beatings and the bombing of his house. In 1962, after black students at the city’s Miles College had initiated an effective boycott of downtown businesses to protest segregation and job discrimination, merchants agreed to desegregate lunch counters, toilets, and drinking fountains. This proved too much for Public Safety Commissioner Bull Connor, who locked up the Reverend Shuttlesworth. He also sent municipal inspectors to the stores threatening to close them down for building code violations if they did not retract their pledge to integrate their premises. Consequently, plans to operate these facilities without racial distinctions abruptly ceased.\footnote{Williams, Eyes, 182; Fairclough, To Redeem, 112-114; Glenn T. Eskew, But for Birmingham: The Local and National Movements in the Civil Rights Struggle (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1997), 200.}

In 1963, Dr. King and the SCLC launched a new round of demonstrations in the city. After the deadlock in Albany, King looked for another occasion to show that nonviolent resistance could effectively eliminate segregation. King gathered his troops at an SCLC retreat in Dorchester, Georgia, a town originally founded in 1752 by transplanted Puritans from Dorchester, Massachusetts. This time with better planning and greater support from local community groups, the prospects for success rose significantly.

The presence of Bull Connor, who unlike Albany Police Chief Laurie Pritchett did not have a flair for wooing favorable publicity, improved the SCLC’s chances. Connor was in the midst of a tangled political contest that thrust the situation into confusion. Voters in a 1962 referendum had replaced the city council with a commission form of government, thereby eliminating Connor’s position. The following year Connor ran for the newly created mayor’s position and lost to Albert Boutwell, a less extreme segregationist than Connor. The defeated candidate then threw the outcome of the election into the courts, claiming that the outgoing commissioners, himself included, still had two years to serve before their term expired. In effect, until the matter was resolved, Birmingham had two governments. White moderates, who had worked to remove Connor, urged King to give Boutwell a chance before leading demonstrations. Having already postponed his campaign until after the election, King decided that African Americans had waited long enough, that Boutwell though less noxious than Connor was still a segregationist, and in early April protests began in earnest.269

On April 3, demonstrations began at Britling Cafeteria, Woolworth’s, Loveman’s, Pizitz, Kress, and Lane-Liggett Drugs. Numerous churches of varying denominations opened their doors to mass meetings to bolster the morale of the protesters, who faced daily arrest. The pulpits of St. Paul Methodist, Thirgood Colored Methodist Episcopal, First Baptist, 6th Street Baptist, 16th Street Baptist, 4th Avenue Metropolitan AME, and 17th Street Apostolic Overcoming Holiness Churches entertained Dr. King, the Reverend Shuttlesworth and other black leaders who urged on their congregants to take to the streets peacefully.270

Shortly after the police started to arrest marchers downtown, an Alabama judge enjoined King and more than 130 civil rights activists from participating in demonstrations. From his room in the Gaston Motel, which served as movement headquarters, King resolved to violate the state court order and staged a march on Good Friday, April 12. Arrested and jailed, the civil rights leader spent the next week incarcerated. From his cell he wrote the eloquent “Letter from a Birmingham Jail,” which was smuggled outside and published. In it King explained to moderate white clergy why he did not call off the demonstrations to give the new city administration and business leaders more time to negotiate a solution. “For years now I have heard the word ‘Wait!’” King complained. “It rings in the ear of every Negro with piercing familiarity. This ‘Wait’ has almost always meant ‘Never!’ We must come to see, with one of our distinguished jurists, that ‘justice too long delayed is justice denied.’” He also poignantly expressed his personal anguish in not being able to find the words to explain to his six-year-old daughter why she “can’t go to the public amusement park that has just been advertised on television and see[ing] tears well up in her little eyes.”271

However, with King and others in jail, the demonstrations lost momentum. As a result, on April 20 King chose to post bail. At the suggestion of one of his top assistants, James Bevel, King made one of the most controversial decisions of his career by recruiting children to march in place of the dwindling number of participants. On May 2, children ranging in age from six to eighteen, gathered at the Sixteenth Street Baptist Church, adjacent to downtown, and hit the streets of Birmingham. Connor’s troops gave them no more hospitable reception than they did their elders. Snarling police dogs and high-pressure water hoses greeted the young demonstrators and sent them running and tumbling through Kelly Ingram Park, across the street from the church. The adults who accompanied them also went flying into the air and flopped about from the torrents of water hitting them; several were injured including the Reverend Shuttlesworth. The arrests of thousands of youths from the 269 Williams, Eyes, 182-183; Eskew, But for Birmingham, 215-216, 247. Shuttlesworth remarked: “Connor was an undignified Boutwell and Boutwell was a dignified Connor.” (Eskew, 216.) Connor eventually lost his lawsuit.

270 Eskew, But for Birmingham, 217, 223, 260-264.
271 Martin Luther King, Jr., Why We Can’t Wait (New York: Signet, 2000), 69. Shortly before his incarceration, King had delivered a sermon at St. James Baptist Church that sketched out many of the themes in the “Letter.” Fairclough, To Redeem, 118.
“children’s crusade” swelled the jails, so many that Birmingham’s state fairground was deployed to hold the overflow.272

The publicity surrounding police brutality against the young marchers riveted the attention of a national audience viewing the horrible scene on evening news programs. Alarmed by a situation that seemed to be spinning out of control, President Kennedy sent the Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights, Burke Marshall, to Birmingham to mediate between civil rights leaders and the city’s businessmen. Secret negotiations commenced on May 5, while demonstrations continued. On May 8, the so-called Senior Citizens’ Committee of white businessmen, led by David Vann and Sidney Smyer, and King and his allies agreed to a deal desegregating “lunch counters, rest rooms, fitting rooms, and drinking fountains in large downtown department and variety stores” as well as the hiring of an unspecified number of black sales clerks. By the end of July, five department stores had integrated their lunch counters, a few black clerks were hired, the city council removed its segregation laws from the books, and the municipal golf course, which Connor had closed, opened to black patronage.273

Certainly the victory was not complete. Schools, theatres, hotels, and restaurants remained segregated, and more trouble loomed ahead. On May 11, a bomb ripped through the Gaston Motel, where King had been staying, though the minister was not there at the time. That same evening, white terrorists planted sticks of dynamite that blew away the front portion of the home of the Reverend A. D. King, Martin’s brother. In response, a crowd of blacks assembled at the Gaston Motel and retaliated by throwing rocks and bottles at the police who came to investigate the bomb blast. Fueled by pent-up hostilities after a month of watching peaceful demonstrators mauled and arrested, blacks went on a rampage against white passersby and torched stores in the surrounding area. By the next day, this outburst of angry violence came to an end, as King and black leaders helped restore order. A month later on Sunday, September 12, white vigilantes struck again. A bomb blast ripped through the basement of the Sixteenth Street Baptist Church, killing four young girls and injuring worshippers attending services upstairs. Once again, rioting erupted and before the day was over two more black teenagers had been killed.274

1963’s Long, Hot Summer

The Birmingham campaign belonged to a larger series of demonstrations against Jim Crow that swept through the South in 1963. On April 24, William Moore, a white mailman and CORE member from Binghamton, New York was shot and killed on a highway in Alabama while on a one-man walk from Chattanooga, Tennessee to Jackson, Mississippi to protest segregation. On May 1, members of CORE and SNCC resumed the march as a memorial to Moore. Members of the group were arrested and placed in jail after refusing bail. However, their action prompted the mobilization of the Gadsden Freedom Movement in the Alabama town where they were detained. Local residents waged a campaign to desegregate buses, hotels, restaurants, parks, and schools. Although devising innovative tactics, such as “snake dances through downtown stores,” the movement collapsed in the face of white intransigence and harassment.275

272 Eskew, But for Birmingham, 265-276.
273 Fairclough, To Redeem, 127-132; Eskew, But for Birmingham, 294.
274 Eskew, But for Birmingham, 321.
275 Meier and Rudwick, CORE, 215-216.
Demonstrations in North Carolina produced better results. Protests in Durham and High Point witnessed the arrests of over one thousand demonstrators, but the disruptions convinced local authorities to establish biracial committees that led to the desegregation of most public accommodations. In Greensboro, the site of the birth of the sit-in movement, Jesse Jackson, a student at North Carolina A & T and a disciple of Dr. King, undertook a new round of marches, triggering his arrest. In protest, a thousand blacks gathered in Providence Baptist Church and from there marched downtown and blocked the streets at Jefferson Square in the main business district. The disruption caused by the thousands of participants persuaded business and civic leaders to draw up a list of fifty restaurants, motels, and theatres that would desegregate. Desegregation, however, would not be completed until Congress acted in 1964.276

Civil rights proponents compiled a mixed record in Florida. Blacks in Tallahassee, led by CORE sisters Pat and Priscilla Stephens, tried to build upon gains they had made in 1962 in bringing about the desegregation of bus stations, variety-store lunch counters, and restaurant chains such as Howard Johnson’s. In May 1963, CORE held a “stand-in” to integrate the State Theatre. Despite a timely mobilization of Florida A & M students, police broke up the demonstrations with hundreds of arrests, and the theatre owners refused to budge.277 African Americans were more successful in Tampa. In June 1963, Tampa students followed up their successful 1960 sit-ins by picketing two downtown movie theatres that maintained segregation. They sparked the intervention of the city’s Biracial Committee, which brokered a settlement to integrate the movie houses. However, as in Greensboro and Tallahassee, black Tampans had to wait until passage of the 1964 Civil Rights Act for final desegregation of most restaurants and hotels.278

Like Tampa, in a number of cities local businessmen along with civic leaders sought to avoid violent confrontations that might scare away financial development, and they quietly worked to broker desegregation agreements between black leaders and stores. Although African Americans in such cities engaged in demonstrations and boycotts, they were kept to a minimum, just enough to desegregate lunch counters and other forms of public accommodations. Columbia, South Carolina; Dallas, Texas; Augusta, Georgia; and Memphis, Tennessee mostly followed this pattern. For example, the Deep South city of Columbia had aspirations of being named to Look magazine’s “All American City” honor roll, and its mayor, Lester L. Bates, established a biracial committee that by the end of the summer of 1963 oversaw the removal of “all signs indicating race and color... from water fountains, rest rooms, dressing and fitting rooms.”279 In Augusta, the threat by black protesters to conduct demonstrations during the prestigious Master’s Golf Tournament sparked the mayor, Millard Beckum, to pave the way for the desegregation of downtown lunch counters and theatres.280

Despite these breakthroughs in a few Deep South cities, as a general rule most of the progress blacks achieved in desegregating public accommodations came in the southern rim states, and the further one moved into the heart of Dixie, the less chance one would encounter facilities available to blacks.

276 Ibid., 217ff; Chafe, Civilities and Civil Rights, 143-147.
and whites on an equal basis. Even in locations that did accept some measure of racial integration, the changes were far from finished; their completion awaited strong federal intervention. Jackson, Mississippi was a case in point. The challenge to segregation in public accommodations and employment bias began in late 1962, led by the North Jackson NAACP Youth Council and its advisor, John R. Salter, a Sociology professor at the historically black Tougaloo College. In addition to a planned boycott over Christmas, Salter and four Tougaloo students picketed in front of Woolworth’s, downtown on Capitol Street, and were arrested. The boycott proved about 60 to 65 percent effective, but neither city officials nor white businessmen chose to negotiate a settlement.281

On May 28, 1963, three black students from the college, Pearlena Lewis, Memphis Norman, and Anne Moody joined by two white students from the college, Joan Trumpauer and Lois Chafee, began the next stage of protest against Jim Crow. This time they entered Woolworth’s and occupied seats at the white’s-only lunch counter. Instead of serving them, the waitresses turned off the lights and fled to the back of the store while the students remained seated. Within a short time, a crowd of whites came into the store, taunted the demonstrators and then attacked them physically, knocking them off their stools. Moody described the frightening scene: “The mob started smearing us with ketchup, mustard, sugar, pies, and everything on the counter. Soon Joan and I were joined by John Salter, but the moment he sat down he was hit on the jaw with what appeared to be brass knuckles. Blood gushed from his face and someone threw salt into the open wound.”282

Police stood by outside and watched without coming to the protesters’ aid or arresting their attackers. Nevertheless, the boycott and sit-ins galvanized local blacks to take further action. Using the Pearl Street AME Church and the Farish Street Baptist Church for mass meetings and protest staging areas and the Masonic Temple for nonviolent workshops, thousands of blacks began a series of marches through downtown Jackson. Arrests mounted. Included among the incarcerated was Roy Wilkins, the national director of the NAACP who had journeyed to the besieged city. Wilkins had been skeptical of mass action, although the organization’s field representative, Medgar Evers, had worked behind-the-scenes in support of the Jackson movement. Wilkins’ participation was as strategic as it was symbolic, for he wanted to find a way to exert control over events, bring demonstrations to a halt, and focus on the less confrontational economic boycott and a voter registration drive. On the evening of June 11, with marches and sit-ins in abeyance, Evers was ambushed, shot, and killed in his driveway by the white terrorist Byron De La Beckwith. Four thousand mourners crowded into the Masonic Temple for his funeral, and a bloody clash between police and blacks after the services was narrowly averted through the timely intercession of Justice Department representative, John Doar.283

Fearing the outbreak of massive violence in this highly charged atmosphere, President Kennedy urged Jackson Mayor Allen Thompson to negotiate in good faith and defuse the tense situation. Thompson hammered out a proposal with conservative black leaders who had come to control the movement’s Steering Committee, and on June 18 they announced an agreement at a meeting at the Pearl Street AME Church. The offer provided for the hiring of black policemen to patrol black neighborhoods and the promotion of a few blacks in the Sanitation Department. Although the proposed deal completely ignored the desegregation of Jim Crow establishments, a majority of those assembled in the church voted to accept it as a tribute to Evers and because it had the endorsement of

283 Dittmer, Local People, 161-164; Salter, Jackson, 159-84; Moody, Coming of Age, 269-78
President Kennedy. With this, demonstrations ceased, the boycott petered out, and public accommodations in Jackson remained segregated until passage of the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

The demonstrations that Moody and her young counterparts waged across the South not only left them in jeopardy but also their family as well. Parents were punished for their children’s activities with the loss of jobs and the refusal by banks and businesses to extend credit. White Citizens Councils were particularly active in this respect. Moody’s mother, who lived in rural Centerville in southwest Mississippi, wrote her daughter in Jackson that the local “Sheriff had been by telling her that I [Anne] had been messing around with that NAACP group.” Mrs. Moody told Anne not to send her any more movement literature: “I don’t want that stuff here. I don’t want nothing to happen to us here.” Intimidation of civil rights workers inflicted deep emotional as well as physical wounds on them in knowing that their protests placed their families in jeopardy from white supremacist reprisals.

The Deep South did not produce the only hot spots that summer. Cambridge, Maryland, on the state’s Eastern Shore, was racked by demonstrations against Jim Crow public accommodations, housing, and jobs. The campaign was organized by the Cambridge Nonviolent Group, an affiliate of SNCC, and led by Gloria Richardson, a forty-two-year-old mother and graduate of Howard Law School. Richardson, a dynamic and fiercely independent woman, first tried to negotiate with the city council, which wanted to put her demands up for a citywide vote. She refused to place black civil rights at the mercy of the white-majority electorate; instead the Cambridge group initiated a series of protests that increasingly generated clashes with police and hostility from whites. Although committed to nonviolence as a tactic, Richardson did not discourage blacks from arming themselves for protection, as Robert F. Williams had urged earlier in North Carolina. Some portrayed the situation as a throwback to the “Wild West.” With events spinning out of control, the state governor imposed martial law and called in the National Guard. To avoid another Birmingham, this time in a location very close to Washington, D.C., Attorney General Kennedy invited Richardson and SNCC chairman John Lewis to meet with the Cambridge mayor and a representative of the governor in his office. Kennedy told Lewis: “[T]he young people of SNCC have educated me. You have changed me. Now I understand.” On July 23, the parties worked out an accord that created a biracial committee and afforded some measure of desegregation and the promise of low-cost housing for minorities. However, the truce proved temporary. A demonstration led by Richardson against Governor George Wallace of Alabama, who was campaigning for the Democratic nomination for the presidency, turned into mayhem when national guardsmen repelled protesters by firing noxious tear gas at them. Tensions spilled over into the following year.

CIVIL RIGHTS LEGISLATION

President Kennedy and the 1963 Civil Rights Bill

In the meantime, with African Americans taking to the streets throughout the South and with concern for their plight building in the North, President Kennedy called upon Congress and the nation to demolish segregation once and for all. Besides the cities described above, in the months after Birmingham the South witnessed some 800 boycotts, marches, and sit-ins in another 200 locations, producing an estimated 15,000 arrests. As a Justice Department official remarked, Birmingham “convinced the President and [Attorney General] that stronger federal civil rights laws were needed.”

With flash points for racial clashes skyrocketing, on June 11, the same evening Medgar Evers was assassinated, President Kennedy in a particularly eloquent televised address to the nation declared: “We face . . . a moral crisis as a country and a people. It cannot be met by repressive police action. It cannot be left to increased demonstrations in the streets. It cannot be quieted by token moves or talk. It is a time to act in Congress, in your State and local legislative body and, above all, in all of our daily lives.” To this end, he announced that he was sending legislation to Congress to extend equal rights to African Americans in public accommodations, schools, and suffrage.

The March on Washington

A coalition of civil rights organizations intended to make certain that Kennedy lived up to his own stirring words. The March on Washington, which A. Philip Randolph originally conceived in 1941, would finally become a reality in the summer of 1963. Randolph was still alive to lead it, and he served as the titular head. He left the day-to-day planning to his chief assistant, Bayard Rustin, a pioneer of the 1947 Journey of Reconciliation and a brilliant strategist of nonviolent direct-action protests. Joining them in supervising the march were the heads of the “Big Five” (as they were commonly referred to) civil rights groups: Roy Wilkins of the NAACP, Whitney Young of the National Urban League, Martin Luther King, Jr. of the SCLC, James Farmer of CORE, and John Lewis of SNCC. A sixth leader, Dorothy Height of the National Council of Negro Women participated in the planning, but she operated in the background of this male-dominated, leadership group. The goals of the march were to lobby for passage of the Kennedy civil rights bill directed at eliminating segregation and to press the administration and Congress to support provisions barring employment discrimination and creating job training programs. When the president first heard of the proposed rally, he attempted to persuade its leaders to abandon it, fearing that it would spark violent confrontations in the nation’s capital and threaten passage of legislation. Civil rights proponents won Kennedy over by convincing him that such a demonstration would help channel black militancy into disciplined, nonviolent avenues instead of toward retaliatory violence that more radical African Americans were urging.

On August 28, approximately a quarter of a million people, an estimated 190,000 blacks and 60,000 whites, gathered at the Lincoln Memorial to bear witness for freedom. They heard a round of speeches including a trenchant one by John Lewis. Although the SNCC chairman had toned down his remarks at the request of some white liberals and moderate black allies, he still managed to criticize both political parties for moving too slowly on civil rights, warned that the movement would “splinter the desegregated South into a thousand pieces and put them back together in the image of God and democracy,” and concluded: “Wake up, America. Wake up!!! For we cannot stop, and we will not be patient.”

287 Williams, Eyes, 198; Sitkoff, Struggle, 149; Fairclough, To Redeem, 134.
289 Williams, Eyes, 198-199; Garrow, Bearing the Cross, 273-81; Deborah Gray White, Too Heavy A Load: Black Women in Defense of Themselves 1894-1994 (New York: W.W. Norton, 1999), 197.
290 John Lewis, Walking With the Wind, 224.
However, Dr. King delivered the speech that had the greatest impact on the assembled throng and the millions of people who watched it live on television. What is most remembered is the recitation of King’s dream of interracial brotherhood for the present generation of Americans and their children. “All God’s children, black men and white men, Jews and gentiles, Protestants and Catholics,” he chanted, “will be able to join hands and sing in the words of the old Negro spiritual: ‘Free at last. Free at last. Thank God Almighty, we are free at last.’” Nevertheless, before reaching this peroration, King warned those in the White House and halls of Congress, in words as forceful though not as strident as Lewis’s: “There will be neither rest nor tranquility in America until the Negro is granted his citizenship rights. The whirlwinds of the revolt will continue to shake the foundations of our nation until the bright day of justice emerges.”291 With this remarkable address, the march came to a conclusion, the crowd dispersed peacefully, and returned to their homes.

Although a triumph in showcasing the interracial and nonviolent dimensions of the civil rights movement, the precise impact the march had on the pending civil rights measure is difficult to gauge. Surely, the spirit of goodwill generated by the march did not persuade southern white authorities voluntarily to abandon Jim Crow. The experience of James Farmer underscores this point. The CORE director did not attend the Washington march because he was stuck in jail in Plaquemine, Louisiana. In mid-August, the police had arrested him and CORE’s state representative, Ronnie Moore, after they led a demonstration of 500 people to protest segregation and other racist policies in the town. On September 1, following the release of Farmer, blacks held a mass rally at Plymouth Rock Baptist Church, and while the CORE chieftain stayed behind, protesters headed for downtown. They encountered a mob of whites and police who tried to repel the black marchers with tear gas, fire hoses, and electric cattle prods. Rather than retreating and against the wishes of their leaders, some of the blacks fought back by throwing rocks and surging forward. The police had superior firepower and inflicted wounds and injuries on scores of demonstrators, who finally retreated to the church. Hot in pursuit, the police attacked the church building, breaking windows and hurling tear gas canisters inside. Farmer, who had been hiding in the parsonage, escaped with several others to a funeral home in the neighborhood. Fearing for his life if the police found him, Farmer was rescued by supporters who crammed him into the back of a hearse along with Moore and the Reverend Jetson Davis of Plymouth Rock, drove out of town, and fled to New Orleans.292

Congress and the 1963 Bill

While Farmer managed to escape, the Kennedy Administration’s civil rights proposal remained ensnared in Congress. The Democrats controlled Congress, but because of the powerful southern bloc within the party, Kennedy’s legislative forces needed to attract a large number of Republicans to their cause. This was especially true in the Senate, where a minority composed of southern Democrats and conservative Republicans could wield the weapon of the filibuster to prevent a civil rights bill from moving forward. To shut off debate required two thirds of those present and voting, a coalition that had to be forged by Democrats in alliance with the GOP. Thus, despite the March on Washington and the favorable impression it had made, the passage of a strong civil rights bill was far from guaranteed.

292 Meier and Rudwick, CORE, 221-22; Farmer, Lay Bare, 246-52.
Congress became the focal point for action with respect to public accommodations because the Supreme Court had declined to decide cases with sweeping rulings that might settle the matter once and for all. From 1957 to 1967, the high tribunal heard sixty-one lawsuits involving some type of challenge against segregated facilities. Most of them came after the 1960 sit-ins and concerned the right of local authorities to arrest protesters on the basis of municipal laws against breach of peace, disorderly conduct, and trespass. Of the sixty-one cases an overwhelming fifty-seven were decided on narrow legal grounds in support of the protesters. Nevertheless, the justices refused to rule that blacks had a constitutional right to use public accommodations that were not government operated or located in the flow of interstate commerce. Instead, the majority of the court appeared to welcome congressional rather than judicial intervention as the most appropriate method to eliminate segregation in this area.293

To the extent that this held true, the court got its wish in the bill President Kennedy submitted to Congress on June 19, 1963. The omnibus measure contained eight provisions, including a key one that would demolish segregation in all places of lodging, restaurants, amusement areas, and other retail and service establishments. The remainder dealt with equal access to voting, extension of federal power to implement school desegregation, the establishment of a Community Relations Service to mediate racial disputes in localities, renewal of the U.S. Civil Rights Commission, withdrawal of federal funds from programs that practiced racial discrimination, and strengthening existing machinery to rectify employment bias practiced by government contractors. Liberal allies of the president were disappointed that the measure did not include the creation of an Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC), a more potent descendant of the FEPC, and moderate-to-conservative supporters disliked the sweeping coverage of Title II, the public accommodations section. At any rate, on June 26, the omnibus package, HR 7152, went to the House Judiciary Committee headed by Emanuel Celler of Brooklyn, a longtime advocate of civil rights.

Celler schemed to fashion within the committee the strongest possible civil rights bill so that he could have sufficient leeway to bargain for less in negotiations with southern opponents and conservatives. However, Celler played a delicate game. The Kennedy Administration reasoned that it needed the backing of William McCulloch of Ohio, the ranking Republican on the Judiciary Committee and a civil rights proponent in the past, to shape a bipartisan coalition for the bill. McCulloch resided in Piqua, a small town with few blacks, and he favored passage of something closer to the contents of the original Kennedy bill, upon which he had been consulted. Indeed, the White House had won over McCulloch by promising that the administration would not change the bill significantly without first conferring with him and would give the Republicans equal credit with the Democrats for passage of the law. After holding hearings throughout the summer, Celler managed to revise Title II to cover all types of public accommodations such as small retail stores, private schools, law firms, medical associations, and boarding houses over five units. These additions upset both McCulloch and the administration. Hence, on October 15, Attorney General Kennedy met privately with the Judiciary Committee and urged its members to compromise. “What I want is a bill, not an issue,” Kennedy argued. Heeding his plea, the committee reached a compromise on Title II that excluded from coverage personal service firms such as barbershops and small places of amusement such as bowling alleys. Furthermore, to gain GOP support, Celler agreed to soften the EEOC provision he had inserted into the bill.294

---

294 Charles Whalen and Barbara Whalen, The Longest Debate: A Legislative History of the 1964 Civil Rights Act (New York: New American Library, 1985), 1-47. The quote is on 45. However, the bill covered barbershops if they were
The Kennedy Administration’s lawyers had fashioned the public accommodations section in a manner designed to appeal both to Republicans and the Supreme Court. They chose to rely on the Constitution’s Commerce Clause rather than on the Fourteenth Amendment as the basis for attacking segregation. Had the drafters of the legislation shaped their reasoning on the Fourteenth Amendment, it might have meant that racial discrimination in any business or profession licensed by the state would be open to coverage. This would clearly offend conservative Republicans who would see this as an argument for even greater regulation of private enterprise by the federal government. Instead, invoking the Commerce Clause, whose scope was limited to interstate transactions, would be a safer bet to satisfy Republicans.\(^{295}\) Moreover, it would likely satisfy the justices on the high tribunal who had paved the way in striking down segregation when it violated the Commerce Clause rather than the Fourteenth Amendment.

Having overcome the first major hurdle, the managers of the bill had to face an even higher obstacle in the House Rules Committee. Its chairman, Howard Smith of Virginia, a staunch conservative Democrat and segregationist, held the bill captive, refusing even to convene hearings. Not until January 1964 did Smith gavel the committee into session to conduct hearings, but only after fellow members of the body placed intense pressure upon him to do so.

President Johnson and the 1963 Bill

In the interim, the measure had been languishing in the Rules Committee when on November 22, an assassin murdered President Kennedy. His successor, Vice-President Lyndon B. Johnson, the former Senate Majority Leader from Texas who had engineered passage of two compromise voting rights bills in 1957 and 1960, had become a committed advocate of racial equality and spoke passionately about enacting the Kennedy civil rights bill as a memorial to the slain president. In a private meeting with James Farmer shortly after the assassination, in characteristic homespun fashion, Johnson told the CORE leader that he felt committed to eradicating segregation because of the experiences of his black cook, Zephyr Wright. On one occasion, he had asked Mrs. Wright and her husband to transport his dog from Washington to Texas, but she declined and explained that it was tough enough for blacks to travel through the South and find facilities open to them without also having to care for a dog. According to Johnson: “Well, that hurt me. That almost brought me to tears, and I realized how important public accommodations were, and was determined that if I ever had the chance, I was going to do something about it.”\(^{296}\) Over the course of the next seven months, Johnson lived up to his word and applied pressure on congressional leaders in both political parties to stay focused on the bill until it became law.

At the beginning of 1964 the legislative logjam finally broke in the House. Following nine days of hearings, the Rules Committee approved HR 7152 and sent it to the floor of the lower chamber for debate. Supporters turned away southern amendments aimed especially at Title II to weaken the bill, although the House did accept language that prohibited sexual as well as racial discrimination in employment. Congressman Smith had proposed this addition to create opposition to the entire measure from lawmakers who favored racial but not gender equality, but the bill passed nevertheless.

On February 10, the House voted 290 to 130 in favor of HR 7152; 152 Democrats and 138 Republicans overwhelmed 96 Democrats (86 from the South) and 34 Republicans (10 from the South).

Notwithstanding this impressive victory, the fate of the bill remained uncertain. Southern senators promised a long filibuster, and with about a third of the sixty-seven Democrats representing the South, the Johnson Administration needed support from twenty-two of thirty-three Republicans to impose cloture and choke off debate. The key to winning sufficient backing from the GOP turned on wooing Everett Dirksen, the Minority Leader from Pekin, Illinois. The bill’s Democratic floor manager, Hubert Humphrey of Minnesota and his Republican counterpart, the liberal Thomas Kuchel of California, courted Dirksen, who as a conservative supporter of business and property rights had reservations about both the public accommodations and equal employment sections. The president and Justice Department officials also worked on the Illinois senator to insert language into the measure that would satisfy him. The administration had public opinion solidly behind it, as a Harris Poll released in February revealed that sixty-eight percent favored the House-passed bill. The Johnson Administration further ratcheted up the pressure on Republicans by bringing Catholic, Protestant, and Jewish clergy as well as prominent businessmen to the White House in support of the legislation. Indeed, on April 19, religious groups began a twenty-four-hour-a-day vigil at the Lincoln Memorial. At the same time, Dr. King warned Humphrey that if a southern filibuster was allowed to weaken the bill, black southerners would militantly “engage in some type of direct action” in the nation’s capital.

St. Augustine

King and the SCLC had already decided to keep pressure on Congress by spotlighting the burdens of segregation that blacks continued to face throughout the South. They targeted St. Augustine, Florida, the nation’s oldest city, which had already begun preparing to celebrate its 400th anniversary the following year in 1965. In many ways the situation in St. Augustine resembled that of Birmingham. A local civil rights movement led by Dr. Robert Hayling, a dentist and militant head of the NAACP chapter, had been mounting demonstrations against the city’s iron-clad Jim Crow practices since 1963. Although some progress had been made in desegregating lunch counters at Woolworth’s, Howard Johnson’s, and McCrory’s, businessmen and city officials stood united in defense of white supremacy. They openly tolerated the presence of right-wing firebrands such as the Reverend J. B. Stoner of the National States Rights Party, which worked in league with the Ku Klux Klan. These segregationist leaders openly urged whites to take any means necessary to thwart black activism. When King and the SCLC launched marches during the Easter season and into May 1964, white terrorists attacked peaceful demonstrators. The demonstrations gained a good deal of national publicity as white northerners, including the mother of Massachusetts Governor Endicott Peabody, were arrested. During June, SCLC escalated protests by conducting risky night marches through St. Augustine streets, which engendered violence against the participants. White onlookers tossed bottles, rocks, and lit firecrackers at the marchers.

---

298 Ibid., 157-188.
The St. Augustine Movement refused to back down. On June 18, seven SCLC demonstrators jumped into the swimming pool of the segregated Monson Motor Lodge and provoked the ire of its manager, James Brock, who dispersed them by pouring muriatic acid, a cleaning agent, into the pool. The civil rights forces followed this up with a renewed round of marches, sit-ins, and wade-ins at segregated ocean beaches. Though the city’s tourist industry had suffered severe losses from the months of protests, business leaders and city officials would not agree to compromise in any significant way. Just before Congress sent the Civil Rights Act to the White House for his signature, President Johnson tapped his friend, Senator George Smathers of Florida, to intercede and work out a solution to the crisis. On June 30, Smathers persuaded Governor Ferris Bryant to go on record in support of the creation of a biracial committee to help negotiate a settlement. This seemed to defuse the conflict for the time being.300

As these events unfolded in Florida, back in Washington civil rights proponents observed them closely. The crisis was embarrassing to the administration, as the Soviet newspaper Izvestia splashed photographs of the racial clashes on its pages and pointed to the gap between President Johnson’s promises and the continued existence of racial violence in the South. In the Senate, Hubert Humphrey alerted his colleagues that they had to act quickly to reinforce moderate civil rights leaders such as the NAACP’s Roy Wilkins, a Johnson favorite, because “[u]nless this Senate provides a framework of law, then wild men will take over.”301

Passage of the 1964 Civil Rights Act

To gain Dirksen’s approval, Humphrey agreed to a slight modification of Title II, which authorized local governments to try to resolve public accommodations disputes before the federal government filed lawsuits. Moreover, if the Justice Department did so on behalf of any individual, its attorneys had to prove that discrimination resulted from a larger “pattern or practice” of discrimination. Also, civil rights managers acceded to Dirksen’s demand for including in the bill’s coverage the so-called “Mrs. Murphy” clause, which exempted landlords who rented out five or less rooms in their owner-occupied lodging houses. Nevertheless, these modifications did not materially weaken the public accommodations section. The measure banned discrimination by establishments whose goods or services were connected to the flow of interstate commerce and specifically designated for coverage inns, hotels, restaurants, cafeterias, lunchrooms, lunch counters, soda fountains, gasoline stations, movie houses, theatres, concert halls, sports arenas, and exhibition halls. It also prohibited states and municipalities from enforcing segregation in any type of public accommodation. Because of licensing regulations and police power, the scope of this provision ranged widely.302

These efforts proved fruitful in gaining Dirksen’s support and that of his GOP troops. On May 19, Dirksen endorsed the bill, and the senator known for his flowery oratory quoted the French author Victor Hugo: “No army is stronger than an idea whose time has come.”303 More valuable as a politician than a poet, on June 10, the Minority Leader carried over twenty-seven fellow Republicans in joining forty-four Democrats, four more than the necessary sixty-seven, to invoke cloture and silence the more than three-month filibuster waged by the southern opposition. Nine days later, the Senate adopted the administration’s civil rights bill by a vote of seventy-three to twenty-seven. One of the six dissenting Republicans was the arch-conservative Barry Goldwater of Arizona, who that fall would run against Lyndon Johnson for the presidency and suffer another resounding defeat. Because of the modifications in the measure, the bill next went back to the House, which overwhelmingly passed it on July 2. President Johnson immediately signed it into law in a momentous White House ceremony in the East Room attended by congressional and civil rights leaders.304

303 Whalen and Whalen, Longest Debate, 188; Thurber, ibid., 141.

Impact of the Civil Rights Law

The legislation to which Johnson inscribed his name provided a powerful weapon to eradicate Jim Crow public accommodations throughout most of the South. It certainly had a salutary and swift effect in St. Augustine, as restaurants and hotels began serving blacks despite a continuing climate of hostility waged by white supremacist groups. Through the forceful efforts of federal judge William Bryan Simpson, attempts of white vigilantes to intimidate businessmen to abandon desegregation failed, thereby assuring enforcement of the 1964 law.305

Perhaps the most notorious opposition to implementation of the act came in the antics of Lester Maddox in Georgia. Shortly after passage of the 1964 law, Maddox, the owner of the Heart of Atlanta Motel and the Pickrick Restaurant, a fried chicken eatery, belligerently pointed a gun at three blacks seeking to dine at the Pickrick and chased them away. “I’m not going to integrate,” he thundered, “I’ve made my pledge. They won’t ever get any of that chicken.”306 To show that he meant what he said, he wielded a pick ax handle at blacks who persisted in making an attempt to eat at his establishment. He even turned his opposition into a flourishing trade by selling red-painted ax handles as souvenirs for $2 a piece. In the end, his showmanship did not prevent enforcement of the civil rights law, but it did gain him a large political following. After Maddox closed his businesses rather than comply, he won election as governor of the state in 1966.

In some places, especially small town and rural areas, gas stations and other facilities packed away their Jim Crow signs, but still continued their customary practices. For example, even without the printed racial designations, white men were directed to one restroom, white women to another, and black men and women to a third. Furthermore, violence occasionally flared over attempts by blacks to use desegregated facilities. As late as January 1966, in Tuskegee, Alabama, a white gas station attendant shot and killed, Sammy Younge, Jr., a black Navy veteran and member of SNCC, as he attempted to use a “white” toilet. Nevertheless, opposition generally remained scattered, and most facilities fell into line under the new law.307

The Supreme Court Upholds the Civil Rights Act

This proved the case because the U.S. Supreme Court upheld the statute unequivocally. Since Brown, the judiciary had issued a series of rulings that prohibited municipal authorities from operating or leasing swimming pools, golf courses, and restaurants that restricted access to African 306 Bardolph, Civil Rights Record, 511.

More than racial discrimination sanctioned by official agencies, the 1964 law focused on privately owned accommodations that catered to the white public but excluded blacks. Since its rulings in the Civil Rights Cases of 1883, the Supreme Court had failed to reverse its opinion that the Fourteenth Amendment only permitted congressional action against discrimination in privately owned public accommodations if state action was involved. However, the justices had left unresolved the question of whether Congress could enact legislation against Jim Crow public accommodations, under private ownership, by invoking its constitutional power to regulate interstate commerce. In fact, as noted earlier, the framers of the 1964 Civil Rights Act had deliberately crafted the statute along these lines.

Toward this end, the Justice Department filed suit against Lester Maddox for failing to obey the provisions of the Civil Rights Act and serve blacks. Maddox’s lawyers argued that the law did not apply to the Heart of Atlanta Motel and the Pickrick Restaurant because these establishments catered to customers within Georgia, and Congress only had the power to regulate interstate commerce. The Supreme Court dispatched its opinion quickly. On December 14, 1964, a mere five months after the statute had gone into effect, the justices ruled against Maddox and Ollie McClung, the proprietor of a fried chicken restaurant in Birmingham that was even farther off the beaten path of interstate travel than was the Pickrick. Taking an expansive interpretation of the commerce clause and drawing upon a long line of precedents, the Court affirmed the constitutionality of the Civil Rights Act. Although Maddox and McClung’s enterprises dealt mainly with intrastate customers, the tribunal found they were open to interstate trade however remote and sold food that had moved across state lines. Besides, their segregationist practices unduly burdened African Americans who traveled from one state to another.

For the most part, the Civil Rights Act of 1964, its validation by the Supreme Court, and its enforcement by the Justice Department succeeded in wiping out official segregation in public accommodations. This did not mean that all forms of Jim Crow disappeared entirely. The law had excluded small bowling alleys, bars, taverns, and nightclubs if they did not sell food or the bulk of the products served had not come from outside the state. Private clubs, which offered food and lodging, were explicitly not subject to the law, and many such establishments sprang up and confined membership to whites only. Furthermore, the formal dismantling of Jim Crow did not keep the races from separating themselves voluntarily within public accommodations or wipe out the customary preferences people felt for associating with members of their own race with whom they felt most comfortable.

---

311 The courts took a dim view of these clubs if they served food that had moved interstate or if the clubs advertised in magazines distributed to guests in other motels and restaurants. Bardolph, Civil Rights Record, 515; Barnes, Journey, 183.
Overcoming Continued Discrimination

Passage of federal legislation did not necessarily guarantee that it would be enforced at the local level without pressure from the black community. Mississippi, the state that had resisted racial equality most forcefully, did not give in without a challenge. In Greenwood, where SNCC had spent several years organizing, the McGhee family led the way to test compliance with the act. Silas McGhee, a high school senior, and his older brother, Jake, made it a regular practice in the summer of 1964 to go to the previously segregated movie theatre in town. They managed to buy tickets and get inside, but usually when they emerged they had to face a crowd of whites that taunted them. On July 16, Silas was kidnapped at gunpoint by three men but managed to escape. The Justice Department filed charges against the assailants under the Civil Rights Act, but violence against the McGhees persisted throughout the summer. Silas and Jake were also members of a committee established by the local chapter of the NAACP to test whether public accommodations were open to blacks after passage of the law. At first, businesses in the center of town refused to serve them and were willing to pay the $500 fine for disobeying the 1964 statute. However, when the civil rights activists stepped up their efforts and the fines mounted, most establishments such as the Holiday Inn relented, some converted to private-membership-only clubs, and others went out of business.312

In addition, sporadic resistance to integration surfaced years after passage of the landmark law. In 1968, students at Orangeburg State College in South Carolina, protested at a bowling alley that remained segregated and were attacked by police. This confrontation sparked blacks to retaliate by hurling rocks and bottles at passing cars. The situation spun out of control as police and National Guardsmen invaded the campus to restore order. After a student struck a policeman with a banister post, troops opened fire, resulting in the shooting of thirty-three blacks, three of whom died. The federal government subsequently brought criminal charges against nine state police officers for their part in the “Orangeburg Massacre,” but they were acquitted.313

The Legacy of the 1964 Civil Rights Act

Despite these notable exceptions, since 1964 the desegregation of public accommodations has remained the rule. The sociologist James Button noted that Title II “clearly broadened and deepened the federal commitment to ending segregation in public accommodations. Compliance with the law in the South was relatively prompt and extensive, although acceptance in rural, Old South areas tended to be ‘minimal and grudging.’”314

The 1964 landmark statute was crucial in bringing about this transformation. Yet in comparison to the other provisions of the Civil Rights Act, the enforcement of Title II has generated less contentiousness overall. It has not stirred up questions about racial preferences and quotas as did affirmative action and busing. Nor has it prompted federal bureaucrats to construct formulas for providing racial balance in schools and employment. Even the 1965 Voting Rights Act, which also 312 Payne, I’ve Got the Light of Freedom, 210-213, 319-320.

commanded wide support in eliminating the main barriers disfranchising southern blacks, has produced more lasting controversy. Concerns have arisen as Justice Department attorneys found ways of ensuring the election of a larger number of blacks more in line with their proportion of the electorate. Thus, in contrast to education, the labor force, and suffrage, desegregation of public accommodations posed less of a challenge to traditional notions of racial equality as defined in terms of individual access as opposed to group preferences.\(^{315}\)

As the twentieth century came to a close, Randall Kennedy, a Harvard law professor, summed up the impact the 1964 act had on the daily lives of African Americans:

A trip by car between Washington, D.C., and Columbia, S.C., is radically different today than it was thirty-five years ago. Gone is the fear that one might feel the need to use a toilet outside those few areas in which gas station attendants permitted “colored” to use facilities. Gone are signs distinguishing between restrooms for “Negro Women” and “White Ladies.” Gone is the sense that the southbound highways out of the District of Columbia constituted a vast no-man’s-land to be traveled only after careful planning and still at one’s peril. Gone are the overt, assertive banners of Jim Crow pigmentocracy.\(^{316}\)

After 1964, because of this success and because of changes within the black freedom struggle, integration took on less urgency than in the past. As the civil rights movement transformed into a struggle for Black Power, emphasis shifted from desegregation to the development of black political and economic muscle. African Americans still wanted equal access to good schools, employment, housing, and public accommodations, but they placed a higher priority on gaining the necessary resources to build up their own communities and strengthening the political, social, economic, and cultural institutions inside them. Increasingly, many African Americans rejected the “Melting Pot” version of citizenship, supposedly the heritage of the American ethnic experience. Instead, they embraced a pluralism that allowed them to maintain their black identity and values while at the same time striving to function as all other Americans entitled to all the protections of the Constitution.

For many African Americans, electoral politics replaced protest as the main weapon for achieving racial progress. After passage of the 1965 Voting Rights Act, which finally enfranchised the majority of southern blacks, former civil rights activists such as SNCC’s John Lewis, Julian Bond, Charles Sherrod, and Marion Barry together with the SCLC’s Andrew Young and Hosea Williams won election to political office. Black mayors came to power in some of the South’s largest cities—Atlanta, New Orleans, Charlotte, and Houston—and in former trouble spots such as Birmingham and Selma, Alabama. Once in office, black politicians tackled the lingering problems of institutional racism embedded in centuries of white supremacy.\(^{317}\)

However, issues related to quality education, adequate housing, decent-paying jobs, and impartial policing of neighborhoods have proved as difficult to resolve as that of overturning a century of Jim Crow restrictions. As a result of the civil rights movement and affirmative action programs the size of the middle class has expanded; nevertheless, widespread poverty and low incomes continued to affect blacks at a disproportionately higher rate than whites. For many African Americans it mattered little whether they could eat at a restaurant or stay at a hotel if they did not have the money to pay for the services.318

Overall, movements for desegregation that are seen as the property of one ethnic group often have a wider impact that transcends their originating communities. Although the 1964 Civil Rights Act was largely seen as a response to the demands of African Americans during the black civil rights movement, the legislation had a dramatic and beneficial impact on all racial minorities, including Latinos. These intersecting movements and communities demonstrate that racial segregation influenced the lives of many people across the country. While being local in its impact, segregation was a national problem that took several years and multiple individuals, organizations, and communities to break down. Although the movements often operated within particular regions, the sum of these efforts contributed to the decline of segregation in public accommodations.

As the United States celebrated its bicentennial in 1976, the nation no longer resembled the landscape witnessed by the Founding Fathers. The country had grown enormously in size and shape, its cities had come to predominate over its farms, its population of foreign immigrants had diversified from its original Native American, Meso American, and European origins to include residents from every corner of the world, its central government had grown enormously in size and power, and its once-tiny military occupied bases throughout the globe. Of all these spectacular changes, none was more profound than the liberation of African slaves and the extension of constitutional rights to them and their descendants. The process was bloody and far from smooth; in fact, African Americans generally experienced little success until the last several decades preceding the 200th anniversary of the nation’s creation. Nevertheless, despite the problems in racial and economic inequality that persist, thanks to the post-World War II civil rights movement African Americans will have fewer hurdles to overcome in achieving genuine equality before the nation celebrates its 300th birthday.

F. ASSOCIATED PROPERTY TYPES

This section is intended to assist agencies and individuals seeking to identify and evaluate properties under the Racial Desegregation of Public Accommodations theme study for possible designation as National Historic Landmarks. It is divided into two subsections: 1) property types that describe the kinds of places associated with racial discrimination, and, 2) registration requirements that set the level of national significance needed for a property to qualify for National Historic Landmark consideration.

1. PROPERTY TYPES

Because the struggle to gain equal access to public accommodatings is based on gaining equality through judicial activism and nonviolent direct protests, properties identified under this study are divided into types that reflect the strategies used to compel the U.S. Supreme Court, Congress, and the executive administration into providing stringent remedies for discrimination in accommodations. These strategies include legal reform, massive organization, and protest and conflict as described below.

Places associated with legal reform will be those where individuals were denied equal access to public transportation or accommodations based on race. Examples of property types include trains, cars, buses, steamships, restaurants, theaters, bus terminals, train stations, motels, parks, and inns where the incidents occurred. Another property type under legal reform is a courthouse associated with a majority of significant rulings in public accommodation discrimination cases.

Places associated with massive organization will be those where members of grassroots organizations gained support and planned campaign strategies to desegregate facilities, or where protest participants trained in nonviolent methods and philosophy. Examples of property types include churches, motels, homes, and institutions.

Places associated with protest and conflict will include buildings and sites where groups challenged or protested against discriminating accommodations. Such actions include marches, sit-ins, and other attempts to integrate facilities. Examples of properties include restaurants, parks, department stores, churches, and train and bus terminals.

2. REGISTRATION REQUIREMENTS FOR NATIONAL HISTORIC LANDMARK DESIGNATION FOR RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

National Historic Landmarks under the Racial Desegregation of Public Accommodations theme study must be acknowledged to be among the nation’s most significant properties associated with the areas of legal reform, massive organization, and protest and conflict in the quest for equal access to accommodations. The association must have occurred between 1865 with the advent of emancipation and Reconstruction, and 1965 when the U.S. Supreme Court declared the public accommodations clause (Title II) of the 1964 Civil Rights Act to be constitutional.

Nationally significant associations and high integrity are the thresholds for designation. A property must have a direct and meaningful documented association with an event or individual and must be evaluated against comparable properties associated with the theme study before its eligibility for National Historic Landmark designation can be confirmed.
Significance

National Historic Landmark (NHL) criteria (Code of Federal Regulations, Title 36, Part 65.4 [a and b]) are used to describe how properties are nationally significant for their association with important events or persons. These places are most often closely associated with actions by the federal government or grassroots groups that were precedent setting in the history of racially segregated accommodations. Such places can be documented as being highly important in one of four areas: 1) interpretation of the U.S. Constitution, 2) passage of federal legislation, 3) intervention by the executive administration, and 4) nonviolent action by grassroots groups. Public accommodation properties will be eligible for National Historic Landmark designation under NHL Criterion 1, 2, or 3.

Criterion 1: Properties that are associated with events that have made a significant contribution to, and are identified with, or that outstandingly represent, the broad national patterns of United States history and from which an understanding and appreciation of those patterns may be gained.

Criterion 2: Properties that are associated importantly with the lives of persons nationally significant in the history of the United States.

Criterion 3: Properties that represent some great idea or ideal of the American people.

The following discussion describes NHL Criteria 1, 2, and 3 as applied to the Racial Desegregation of Public Accommodations context and respectively lists how property types may be nationally significant.

Criterion 1

NHL Criterion 1 recognizes properties associated with events important in the broad national patterns of U.S. history. These can be specific one-time events or a pattern of events that made a significant contribution to the development of the United States. Patterns of events in the public accommodations study follow specific periods of civil rights history in America. These include: 1) Defining Civil Rights and Segregating Public Accommodations, 1865-1900, 2) Rekindling Civil Rights and Maintaining Segregated Public Accommodations, 1900-1940, 3) Birth of the Civil Rights Movement and Challenging Segregated Public Accommodations, 1941-1954, and 4) the Modern Civil Rights Movement and Desegregating Public Accommodations, 1955-1965.

Under Criterion 1, it may be shown that a property associated with legal reform, massive organization, or protest and conflict is significant with one of the following chronological patterns in the history of equal access to public accommodations.

(1) Defining Civil Rights and Segregating Public Accommodations, 1865-1900

During this period emancipation and Reconstruction gave way to constitutionally approved segregated public accommodations. Rights to equality first surfaced when Congress gave blacks full citizenship through the Fourteenth Amendment, and equal access to public transportation and accommodations through the Civil Rights Act of 1875. These rights became limited in 1883 when the U.S. Supreme Court ruled the Civil Rights Act unconstitutional because the Fourteenth Amendment gave Congress the power to restrain states, but not private individuals, from acts of racial discrimination. Lacking a federal civil rights statute, blacks turned to the Interstate Commerce Act passed by Congress in 1887 that prohibited discrimination between persons. Hence transportation became the legal focal point for probing the constitutionality of segregated accommodations. For the next three years the U.S. Supreme Court deemed segregated accommodations lawful under the commerce clause (Article 1, Section 8) of the Constitution. Ultimately in 1896 the Court established that state laws requiring separate but equal facilities were legal under the Fourteenth Amendment. Thus, no federal protection existed over private or state-sponsored discrimination in public accommodations.

- A property associated with legal reform during this phase may be significant under Criterion 1 if it is associated with a precedent setting U.S. Supreme Court ruling regarding the right of states to regulate travel, or the right of individuals and states to racially segregate public transportation and accommodations.

(2) Rekindling Civil Rights and Maintaining Segregated Public Accommodations, 1900-1940

During this phase segregated accommodations remained legally steadfast. The U.S. Supreme Court and the Interstate Commerce Commission (ICC) continued to uphold the separate but equal doctrine, and segregation even reentered the federal workforce in the Wilson administration. While direct action protest generally waned between World War I and the 1930s, a changing white attitude toward discrimination and the migration of African Americans from the South to the North during the war resulted in their greater political strength. As a result, the Roosevelt administration furthered black interests by creating the Civil Rights Section of the Justice Department, and Eleanor Roosevelt took a strong stance on promoting racial equality.

- A property associated with protest and conflict during this phase may be significant under Criterion 1 if it represents federal intervention vital to bringing the issue of Jim Crow segregation to the national foreground.

(3) Birth of the Civil Rights Movement and Challenging Segregated Public Accommodations, 1941-1954

This period reflects the first legal and grassroots strides that ended some aspects of de jure segregated transportation. Between 1941 and 1950, the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund (LDF) and the Justice Department pursued cases in which state-imposed discrimination was declared unconstitutional in first class Pullman rail cars, dining cars, and interstate bus travel. Yet, segregation in interstate travel remained pervasive as rail and bus companies derived their own regulations to compensate for the loss of state laws. A challenge to Jim Crow busing in Baton Rouge began an era of other bus boycotts in the South. The period concluded with the U.S. Supreme Court’s decision in Brown v. Board of Education that would be highly influential in lower federal court decisions requiring integrated publicly owned facilities.

- A property associated with legal reform under this phase may be significant under NHL Criterion 1 if it is associated with a U.S. Supreme Court ruling overturning segregated transportation.
A property associated with massive resistance under this phase may be significant under NHL Criterion 1 if it had an important impact on the civil rights movement.

(4) Modern Civil Rights Movement and Desegregating Public Accommodations, 1955-1964

During this phase grassroots organizations fought southern massive resistance through boycotts and nonviolent direct action to force a crisis that would prompt the federal intervention needed for racial groups to gain equality under the Constitution. In the 1950s, these campaigns were established within the institution of the black church where ministers led highly organized protests, such as the Montgomery bus boycott. Leaders from these campaigns formed the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC, founded 1957) with Martin Luther King, Jr. as its president. A second revolutionary phase in the early 1960s transformed the church-led movement to a student-led movement on a massive south-wide scale. Student sit-in leaders formed the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC, founded 1960). Together with the Congress on Racial Equality (CORE founded in Chicago in 1942), these three organizations assisted local communities in the struggle for equal access in accommodations. Prominent campaigns occurred in Albany, Georgia; Birmingham, Alabama; and during the 1961 Freedom Ride. The sometimes-violent campaigns led to integrating terminal facilities, intrastate transportation, and public accommodations through enforcement of the commerce clause and passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The period ended when the U.S. Supreme Court declared that the public accommodation clause (Title II) of the Civil Rights Act was constitutional.

A property associated with legal reform under this phase may be significant under Criterion 1 if it was pivotal to interpreting the constitutionality of Title II of the Civil Rights Act, or overturning discrimination in public transportation.

A property associated with massive organization under this phase may be significant under Criterion 1 if it represents an important new phase of the civil rights movement, or a strategic step in a SNCC, CORE, or SCLC campaign that proved crucial to the movement.

A property associated with protest and conflict during this phase may be significant under Criterion 1 if it was pivotal to the grassroots strategy directly leading to the enforcement of the Interstate Commerce Act or passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

Criterion 2

In order to be designated as a National Historic Landmark under Criterion 2, a property must be associated with an individual who played a critical role within the Racial Desegregation of Public Accommodations context in the areas of legal reform, massive organization, or protest and conflict. The individual must have made nationally significant contributions that can be specifically documented and that are directly associated with both the public accommodations context and the property being considered. To determine a definitive national role, it will be necessary to compare the individual’s contributions with the contributions of others in the same field. General guidance for nominating such properties is given in National Register Bulletin 32: Guidelines for Evaluating and Documenting Properties Associated with Significant Persons. While Martin Luther King, Jr. is identified as the preeminent leader in the civil rights movement, other ministers and organizational and institutional leaders may have also been crucial to the success of the modern civil rights movement at the national level.
• Persons whose associated properties are likely to be eligible under NHL Criterion 2 in the area of legal reform might include a judge who championed the cause of civil rights through court decisions leading to the creation of a new society in the South.

• Persons whose associated properties are likely to be eligible under NHL Criterion 2 in the area of massive organizing might include an activist who can be documented as a preeminent leader in desegregating public accommodations, or an activist whose work in organizing or in nonviolent training and philosophy was vital to sustaining the protest movement across the South.

• Persons whose associated properties are likely to be eligible under NHL Criterion 2 in the area of protest and conflict might include an activist whose role was pivotal to a planned campaign that was important in the southern civil rights strategy leading to national reform.

Criterion 3

This criterion requires the most careful scrutiny and would apply only in rare instances involving ideas and ideals of the highest order in the history of the United States. The concept of being treated equally is a primary ideal of the American people embedded in the Constitution of the United States and the ideal of democratic equal rights for all U.S. citizens.

• A property may be significant under NHL Criterion 3 if the associated event was pivotal in the executive administration’s decision to move forward with civil rights legislation, as opposed to a property associated with a court ruling under Criterion 1, and can be documented as inspiring Congress in passing the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

NHL Exceptions

Certain kinds of property are not usually considered for National Historic Landmark designation including religious properties, moved properties, birthplaces and graves, cemeteries, reconstructed properties, commemorative properties and properties achieving significance within the past fifty years. These properties can be eligible for listing however, if they meet special requirements called NHL Exceptions. The following exceptions may be anticipated in public accommodation properties:

Exception 1: Many religious properties are associated with the African American civil rights movement as gathering places. To be eligible for consideration, churches must derive their primary national significance from their roles in the movement as meeting places.

Exception 4: A birthplace, grave, or burial would be considered for designation if it is for a historical figure of transcendent national significance and no other appropriate site, building or structure directly associated with the productive life of that person exists.

Exception 8: The modern civil rights movement occurred within the last fifty years. Normally properties that have achieved significance within the last 50 years are not eligible for National Historic Landmark designation. However, extraordinarily significant events that occurred during this time period may have made some of these properties exceptionally important and therefore eligible for National Historic Landmark designation.
Integrity

Properties considered for registration as National Historic Landmarks must meet one of the NHL criteria identified above and meet any NHL exceptions. In addition, the property must retain integrity. Integrity is defined as the ability of a property to convey its significance. There are seven aspects or qualities of integrity: location, design, setting, materials, workmanship, feeling, and association. All properties must retain the essential physical features that define both why a property is significant (criteria and themes) and when it was significant (periods of significance). These are the features without which a property can no longer be identified as, for instance, an early 20th century church or courthouse. For National Historic Landmark designation, properties should possess these aspects to a high degree. The following is a description of the aspects of integrity and special issues that may be anticipated with public accommodation properties.

Location is the place where the historic property was constructed or the event occurred. Any public accommodation property that has been moved is unlikely to be eligible for consideration. However, some public accommodation properties were constructed to be mobile, for example a boat or a bus. Their significance is inherent in their ability to move. In most instances, they are not located where the historic event(s) with which they are associated occurred. These properties may still be able to convey their importance despite not being at the location where the event(s) occurred. Thus, it is not required that movable objects be at their original location in order to retain integrity. However, they should be located in an appropriate setting.

Setting is the physical environment of a historic property. Over time settings may have changed, for instance, where demonstrations occurred in a park, along a marching route, or around a building or in an urban setting. Consider the significance of the individual property and whether the setting is important in interpreting that significance. Buses, or other movable objects which have been removed from a transportation setting and are now museum objects, generally will not qualify for landmark designation.

Design is the combination of elements that create the historic form, plan, space, structure, and style of a property. This includes such elements as organization of space, proportion, scale, technology, ornamentation, and materials. In evaluating integrity of design, ask whether changes over time altered the design associated with the historical significance of the particular property. Property types associated with public accommodations, such as churches, stores, restaurants, and bus stations may have experienced interior and exterior changes because of expansion, a new use, or even a bombing. A store may have become a restaurant, a church may have a new addition, or a train station may have been converted to a museum. In these instances, take into account the significance of the property and whether it can still convey the event for which it is important, such as a sit-in at a lunch counter or an attempt to integrate a waiting room. Design can also apply to districts and to the historic way in which the buildings, sites, or structures are related. An example is an urban area where a protest took place. Determination of integrity will require a knowledge of how and where the protest occurred and if those associated public spaces and buildings can convey their historical association.

Materials are the physical elements that were combined or deposited during a particular period of time and in a particular pattern or configuration to form a historic property. Rehabilitation of buildings over time, or bombings that occurred during the movement, may have altered materials from those present during the associated event. A property must retain the key materials dating from its period of significance to be eligible under this theme study. If a property has been rehabilitated, the historic materials and significant features must have been preserved. Repairs to properties that have been bombed may take into account any changed historic material. A new door or windows, may reflect the significance of the building and in this case a change in material may be acceptable.

Workmanship is the physical evidence of the crafts of a particular culture or people during any given period in history. This element is most often associated with architecturally important properties. However, it is also of importance to public accommodation properties for illustrating a time period associated with the event.

Feeling is a property’s expression of the aesthetic or historic sense of a particular period of time. With regard to public accommodation properties, integrity of feeling may be associated with the concept of retaining a “sense of place.” For example an early 20th century train terminal that retains its original design, materials, workmanship and setting will relate the feeling of its time and culture.

Association is the direct link between an important historic event or person and a historic property. In public accommodations this will be where planned protests, meetings, training, and discrimination incidents occurred.

Evaluation

Finally, each property being considered for National Historic Landmark consideration under the Racial Desegregation of Public Accommodations theme study must be evaluated against other comparable properties associated with the same theme. Comparing individual properties with similar ones associated with the same event or elsewhere in the country provides the basis for determining which sites have an association of exceptional value or quality in illustrating or interpreting the history of discrimination in public accommodations.
G. GEOGRAPHICAL DATA

The scope of the study included the entire United States. Because most of the events and decisions associated with public accommodations are concentrated mainly in the South due to de jure segregation, the majority of properties significant at the national level associated with this theme will be located in the South.
H. SUMMARY OF SURVEY AND IDENTIFICATION METHODS

This section is intended to provide agencies and individuals seeking to identify and evaluate properties under the Racial Desegregation of Public Accommodations theme study with a description of how the survey was conducted and the survey’s results. It is divided into two subsections: 1) methodology for National Historic Landmark identification and evaluation, and 2) survey results.

1. METHODOLOGY FOR NATIONAL HISTORIC LANDMARK IDENTIFICATION AND EVALUATION

Creating the Context

At the beginning of the study, the National Park Service partnered with the Organization of American Historians to obtain scholars with expertise in civil rights and public accommodations to prepare the theme study’s historic context. National Park Service staff then directed the scholars to use primary and secondary resources to produce a chronological story of the experiences of certain racial groups in the struggle to gain equal access to public accommodations. These groups included African Americans, Latinos, and Asian Americans. Early work determined that the history of Asian Americans and Native Americans had no significant public accommodation component and these groups were removed from the theme study. The struggle for Asian Americans for equal treatment in terms of public accommodations was largely settled with the ending of their special status as aliens ineligible for citizenship in the era of 1943-1952. While there are individual examples of local denial of equal accommodations—such as in Seattle and Los Angeles—they did not leave a trail of case law. By the time most successful suits about equal accommodations were instituted, Asian Americans were not being denied them to any great degree. For Native Americans (including Alaska Natives and Native Hawaiians) an earlier National Park Service study, Civil Rights in America: A Framework for Identifying Significant Sites (draft, 2002), did not identify public accommodations as a concern when compared to other civil rights issues facing Native Americans. The study recommended that the National Park Service consult with Native Americans regarding the completion of a separate theme study for the history of Native American civil rights.

Essays were prepared in sufficient depth to support the relevance, relationships and national importance of places to be considered for National Historic Landmark designation that included the following aspects:

- economic, social, judicial, and political forces related to the topic,
- significance of individuals and events crucial or definitive to the story,
- places associated with these individuals and events, and
- how this story affected people in their everyday lives.

Inventory Search for Sites Recognized as Historically Significant

A list of existing landmarks associated with public accommodations was compiled using the inventory contained in National Landmarks, America’s Treasures: The National Park Foundation’s Complete Guide to National Historic Landmarks (2000) under the topic of civil rights. African American sites on the National Register were located using the inventory contained in African American Historic Places (1994). Latino sites on the National Register were searched via the National Register Information System (NRIS) for the period between 1925-1965 when Latino national organizations first began to form and communities sought relief from social injustice.

Archival Sources

To gain additional perspective and scholarly opinions within which to evaluate events and properties, National Park Service staff conducted intensive research using secondary and primary sources. For general overviews, The Historical Dictionary of the Civil Rights Movement by Ralph Luker, and ABC-CLIO’s The Civil Rights Movement by Mark Grossman provided capsule summaries of individuals, cases, and events from the post civil war period to the mid 1960s. In the area of public transportation, Catherine Barnes’s Journey from Jim Crow: The Desegregation of Southern Transit served as the single best source for the legislative, judicial, and social aspects of the segregation and desegregation of public transportation in the South. For the 1961 Freedom Ride, John Lewis’s Walking with the Wind and James Peck’s Freedom Ride served as important resources.

For legal aspects of both public transportation and accommodations, Kermit L. Hall’s (ed.), The Oxford Companion to the Supreme Court of the United States placed court rulings within judicial and social context. A useful article on the history of sit-in cases (including a listing of every case the Supreme Court heard between 1957-1967) was “A Model for Judicial Policy Analysis: The Supreme Court and the Sit-In Cases,” in Joel B. Grossman and Joseph Tanenhaus, (eds.), the Frontiers of Judicial Research (1969). Unlikely Heroes by Jack Bass provided the story of the U.S. Fifth Circuit of Appeals in racial discrimination rulings in the South. As a primary source, the U.S. Supreme Court opinions on transportation and public accommodations cases provided place descriptions, case background, and Court attitudes.

Important sources for gaining student-led and national perspectives were David Halberstam’s The Children, Taylor Branch’s Parting the Waters: America in the King Years, 1954-63, C. Vann Woodward’s The Strange Career of Jim Crow, and Steven Lawson’s and Charles Payne’s Debating the Civil Rights Movement. On the grassroots strategy, an important work of the civil rights movement immediately following the Brown decision was Aldon Morris’s The Origins of the Civil Rights Movement. Sources on the Birmingham protests included Glenn T. Eskew’s But for Birmingham, Andrew M. Manis’ A Fire You Can’t Put Out, Diane McWhorter’s Carry Me Home, Marjorie L. White’s Freedom Walk, and Birmingham Revolutionaries edited by Marjorie L. White and Andrew M. Manis.

Based on the context and the above archival sources, data was compiled to assist in identifying associated property types and establishing national significance levels as contained in Appendices B-D. Appendix B includes a chronological list of selected local/national movements used to identify trends and compare outcomes of the grassroots movement from the mid-1950s to 1963. Appendix C provides a chronology of the May 1961 Freedom Ride used to identify events and property, and to note property integrity. Lastly, Appendix D contains a compilation of associated federal action used to compare the impact of judicial rulings on the civil rights movement and to identify associated properties and property types.
Site Verification and Integrity

National Park Service staff directly contacted State Historic Preservation Offices to verify the existence of sites. Staff also conducted some site visits to properties close to the office or to areas with a concentration of properties. These included properties associated with the 1961 Freedom Ride in Alabama and Mississippi, a train terminal in Richmond, Virginia associated with an NAACP desegregation case; several sites in Birmingham, Alabama associated with that city’s early movement and the 1963 protests; the former Highlander Folk School in Monteagle, Tennessee; Clark Memorial Baptist Church in Nashville, Tennessee associated with nonviolent training, and a parking deck in Wilmington, Delaware associated with a Supreme Court ruling on state responsibility in civil rights on publicly leased property.

Peer Review

This study was made available for national and state level review and for scholarly peer review. National review consisted of making the study available for all National Park Service staff in the National Register, History, and Education Division, and for National Park Service historians with expertise in African American history. The study was made available for review and comment to all State, Federal, and Tribal Historic Preservation Officers via the internet. Lastly, three historians conducted a scholarly peer review: Drs. Vicki Ruiz, Professor of History and Latino Studies, University of California, Irvine; Charles Vincent, Professor of History, Southern University & A&M College; and Robert Pratt, Associate Professor of History, University of Georgia.

2. SURVEY RESULTS

This section identifies properties associated with events considered nationally significant during the course of the study. Properties are listed within 1) the sub-areas of “public transportation” and “public accommodation,” and, 2) specified time periods established under NHL Criterion 1. Each listing notes the property (shown in bold) and the associated event or individual (show in italics), followed by a brief description of the significance of the event and property integrity. This is not an exhaustive list of properties that may be considered for designation under this study.

Following the list of properties are three tables that categorize the properties according to 1) those already recognized as nationally significant, 2) those recommended for further study for National Historic Landmark consideration, and 3) those other properties and events considered during the survey, but not recommended for further consideration.

PUBLIC TRANSPORTATION

Segregating Public Transportation, 1865-1900

The properties listed below are associated with legal reform and precedent setting U.S. Supreme Court rulings on either the right of states to regulate interstate travel, or the constitutionality of racial segregation in public transportation.

Steamship
Hall v. DeCuir (1878)
In this case, the U.S. Supreme Court held that only Congress could regulate interstate travel. The plaintiff had sued, based on a Louisiana statute prohibiting racial segregation, when the steamship captain denied her access to a stateroom reserved for whites on an intrastate trip between New Orleans and Hermitage. In its decision the Court reasoned that because the steamship also traveled between Louisiana and Mississippi, the Louisiana statute also regulated interstate travel, which only Congress could do. Thus, states could not require carriers engaged in interstate commerce to offer integrated facilities, even when the trip took place only within state boundaries. Specific ship unknown.

Tennessee Parlor Car

Civil Rights Cases (1883)
The federal government bought these cases to the U.S. Supreme Court to test the public accommodations language of the Civil Rights Act of 1875 that prohibited racial discrimination in public conveyances. Included in the cases was Robinson v. Memphis and Charleston Railroad Company whereby a black woman was prohibited from entering a parlor car. In its decision, the Court ruled that the Fourteenth Amendment gave Congress the power to restrain states, but not individuals, from acts of racial segregation. The decision essentially mandated the removal of the federal government from civil rights enforcement. Specific train unknown.

(no specific property)

Louisville, New Orleans & Texas Railway v. Mississippi (1890)
The U.S. Supreme Court upheld a Mississippi statute requiring segregation on trains traveling through the state after the railroad sued to stop infringement on interstate travel. This ruling was opposite that in Hall v. DeCuir (1878) ruling when the Court found that only Congress could regulate interstate travel, thus maintaining a major role for the states in the issue of individual rights.
No property available.

East Louisiana Railway Station – New Orleans, Louisiana

Plessy House

John Marshall Harlan House (Judge)

Plessy v. Ferguson (1896)
In this case, the U.S. Supreme Court established the constitutionality of the separate but equal doctrine whereby equal facilities for blacks and whites provided equal protection of the law. As a test case to challenge equal but separate accommodations for blacks and whites, the Plessy decision came to serve as the constitutional foundation for a Jim Crow system. No sites associated with this case were found to exist under The U.S. Constitution National Historic Landmark Theme Study (1986).

Challenging Segregated Public Transportation, 1941-1954

The properties identified below are associated with legal reform and U.S. Supreme Court rulings that overturned segregated public transportation.

Rock Island & Pacific Railway Car

Mitchell v. U.S. (1941)
The U.S. Supreme Court’s decision in this case ended de jure segregation in first class rail for interstate travel and upheld the right of an individual to sue for discrimination. The plaintiff in this case was black congressman Arthur Mitchell who sued after being ordered from the first class car to the second class Jim Crow car. Even though the Justice Department was a defendant in the case, it sided with the plaintiff’s claim of discrimination in what was the first indication of the executive administration’s support in civil rights cases. On the other hand, ten southern states filed an amicus brief to preserve a segregated system. The incident occurred on a train in mid travel. Specific rail cars associated with the case are unknown.

Greyhound Bus

Morgan v. Commonwealth of Virginia (1946)
The U.S. Supreme Court banned segregation in interstate transportation in this case where a bus driver had evicted a black passenger in Saluda after she refused to vacate her seat for a white couple. It was this decision that the Fellowship of Reconciliation (FOR) tested in its 1947 Journey of Reconciliation bus trip (first Freedom Ride) through the Upper South. Regardless, segregated transportation continued in the South as rail and bus lines used their own segregation regulations to replace state segregation statutes for interstate travel. Specific bus associated with this event is unknown.

Columbia (excursion steamer) – Ecorse, Michigan (NHL, 1992)
Sainte Claire (passenger steamboat) – Ecorse, Michigan (NHL, 1992)

Bob-Lo Excursion Company v. Michigan (1948)
The U.S. Supreme Court found discrimination in foreign commerce was unconstitutional in a suit filed after a ferry company evicted a black passenger departing for a trip from Detroit to Bois Blanc Island, Canada. These two remaining classic excursion steamers were designated as National Historic Landmarks under the Maritime Heritage of the United States NHL Theme Study—Large Vessels. Additional research, beyond court documents, is needed to determine which vessel is associated with this case.

Southern Railway Dining Car

Henderson v. U.S. (1950)

In this case, the Supreme Court desegregated railroad dining cars. The case came about when the railway denied the black plaintiff a seat at a dining table reserved for blacks because whites were seated at the table. Even though the Justice Department asked the court to end segregation on interstate railroads, the Court avoided the constitutional issue and decided the case under the issue of equality in the Interstate Commerce Act. Henderson was combined by the government and the NAACP with two professional and graduate school desegregation cases (McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents for Higher Education and Sweatt v. Painter) in a broad attack on segregation. Specific railcar is unknown.

Mount Zion Baptist Church – Baton Rouge, Louisiana

Baton Rouge Bus Boycott (1953)
A bus boycott in this city served as a model for the mid-1950s bus boycotts in Montgomery, Alabama and in Tallahassee, Florida. Reverend Theodore J. Jemison, pastor of the Mt. Zion Baptist Church (who confirmed that meetings were held in this church), led the boycott from June 18 – 25, 1953, that resulted in a compromise for mixed seating in all but the two front seats (for whites) and the rear bench seat (for blacks). Other properties where mass meetings were held, such as Memorial Stadium, should be compared with the church. Church has a 1953 cornerstone and retains integrity.
Desegregating Public Transportation, 1955-1964

Properties listed in this section are associated with legal reform, massive organization, or protest and conflict. These events either interpret the constitutionality of segregated public accommodations, represent a major new phase of the civil rights movement or a strategic step in a national campaign, or were pivotal to a grassroots strategy directly leading to federal enforcement of public accommodations integration.

Broad Street Station - Richmond, Virginia (National Register listed, 1972)
NAACP et al v. St. Louis San Francisco Railway Company et al. (1955)
The Broad Street Station represents the first time the NAACP challenged segregated dining and waiting rooms in rail terminals and was the first case in which the Interstate Commerce Commission rejected the separate-but-equal doctrine in more than sixty years. Participation by the Justice Department in this case reflected the Eisenhower Administration’s civil rights efforts where its jurisdiction was clear under the commerce clause. The station was previously listed on the National Register for its architectural significance. The building interior no longer retains high integrity for consideration as a National Historic Landmark under this theme study.

Carolina Coach Company Bus
Keys v. Carolina Coach Company (1955)
The Interstate Commerce Commission (ICC) struck down separate but equal seating on public transportation in a decision based on Morgan (1946) and Brown v. Board of Education (1954). A U.S. brief filed in the case, along with the NAACP case (above), signified executive level support for ending segregation that, like public schools, signified the inferior status of blacks. In this case, Sarah Keys filed suit after refusing to move to the back of the bus and being evicted during a stop in Roanoke Rapids, North Carolina. She was jailed and later convicted on a charge of disorderly conduct. Specific associated bus is unknown.

Birmingham City Bus
Montgomery Bus Boycott (1955-1956)
On December 1, 1955, civil rights activist Rosa Parks was arrested and jailed after refusing to give up her seat to a white passenger while traveling home from work. The incident sparked a one-day boycott of city buses that led to the organization of the Montgomery Improvement Association and the year-long Montgomery Bus Boycott marking a new era in the modern civil rights movement. Specific associated bus is unknown.

Dexter Avenue Baptist Church – Montgomery, Alabama (NHL, 1974)
Montgomery Bus Boycott (1955-1956)
Martin Luther King, Jr.
This church is associated with its pastor and civil rights activist, Martin Luther King, Jr., and the Montgomery Bus Boycott — described as the first mass protest against racial discrimination heralding a new era of direct action of the modern civil rights movement. King was chosen president of the newly formed Montgomery Improvement Association to lead the bus boycott. Designated as an NHL.
Trailways Bus Station - Richmond, Virginia
Boynton v. Virginia (1960)
This bus station is associated with a U.S. Supreme Court ruling in which the Court found that the Motor Carrier Act prohibited segregated bus terminals, thus extending the Court’s ruling in Morgan (1946) that prohibited segregation on buses. A Howard University law student had been arrested and charged with trespassing after refusing to move from the white to the black section of the terminal’s privately owned restaurant. Because Morgan was not enforced, the Congress on Racial Equality (CORE) decided to use the Boynton case as a test for its 1961 Freedom Ride that succeeded in garnering federal intervention needed to enforce the Interstate Commerce Act and end segregation in public transportation. Property has been demolished.

Greyhound Bus Station – Anniston, Alabama
Freedom Ride (May 14, 1961)
The first in a chain of attacks occurred at this bus station during CORE’s 1961 Freedom Ride. Upon arrival at the bus station, mobs attacked the bus and slashed the tires. Subsequently the bus broke down along the highway and was firebombed, gaining national media coverage. Riders were rescued by members of Reverend Fred Shuttlesworth’s Alabama Christian Movement for Human Rights (ACMHR) and driven to Bethel Baptist Church and parsonage in Birmingham (the designated contact point for the Alabama portion of the Freedom Ride). Property retains high integrity.

Trailways Bus Station – Anniston, Alabama
Freedom Ride (May 14, 1961)
A second Freedom Ride bus arrived at this station and was boarded by hoodlums who beat some riders and segregated all the passengers. The intruders remained on the bus for the ride into Birmingham. Property retains high integrity.

Trailways Bus Station – Birmingham, Alabama
Freedom Ride (May 14, 1961)
When the bus arrived from Anniston, a mob attacked the riders and waiting newsmen at the station. Riders sought safe haven at the Bethel Baptist Church and parsonage. From this point Reverend Shuttlesworth, Attorney General Robert Kennedy, and the bus company coordinated to get riders out of Birmingham. Property has been demolished.
Bethel Baptist Church and Pastorium
Birmingham, Alabama
Freedom Ride (May 1961)
Reverend Fred Shuttlesworth
In a critical turning point in the Freedom Ride, CORE decided to end the ride when the bus company refused to supply a bus or driver, but the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) decided to continue the ride rather than buckle under white segregationist violence. From this site, Reverend Shuttlesworth coordinated the renewed ride with SNCC and Attorney General Robert Kennedy. These properties may also be important for their association with civil rights activist and pastor Fred Shuttlesworth for his pioneering role in the 1950s that influenced the desegregation of public accommodations across the South. Properties retain high integrity.

Greyhound Bus Station – Birmingham, Alabama
Freedom Ride (May 17, 20, 1961)
New SNCC riders arrived at this bus station in Birmingham to continue the Freedom Ride and were taken into the bus station and arrested. To rid the city of the riders, Police Commissioner Bull Connor took them to the Tennessee border, but the riders found passage back to the Bethel Baptist Church parsonage. The Kennedy administration arranged police and highway patrol protection for a bus to take the riders from this station to the Montgomery city limits. Property has high integrity.

Greyhound Bus Station – Montgomery, Alabama
Freedom Ride (May 20 and 24, 1961)
The bus leaving from Birmingham lost police protection at the city line. Upon arriving at this station a mob violently attacked the riders, a federal agent, and newspeople. On May 24, the ride continued to Jackson, Mississippi under protection of federal marshals and state police. Building no longer retains high integrity due to building and setting modifications.
First Baptist Church - Montgomery, Alabama
Freedom Ride (May 21, 1961)

Reverend Ralph Abernathy
In a tense standoff, white segregationists trapped Freedom Riders, Ralph Abernathy, Martin Luther King, Jr. and others in this church during a mass meeting. From the church, King conferred with Attorney General Kennedy to gain safe release of church goers. Martial law was declared. The church may also be significant for its association with Reverend Ralph Abernathy, who, with Martin Luther King, Jr. and others, organized the Montgomery Improvement Association in 1955 to support the Montgomery Bus Boycott. Abernathy also participated in organizing SCLC in 1957, and with King, planned and executed SCLC’s most critical campaigns from Albany to Memphis. Property retains high integrity.

Trailways Bus Station – Montgomery, Alabama
Freedom Ride (May 24, 1961)
Alabama and Mississippi authorities arranged an armed escort in consultation with Attorney General Robert Kennedy for the 258-mile ride to Jackson for twelve Freedom Riders and sixteen reporters. (Second unescorted bus left from Greyhound station 4 hours later.) This property has been demolished.

Greyhound Bus Station – Jackson, Mississippi
Freedom Ride (May 24, 1961)
This was the final destination of the May 1961 Freedom Ride. Riders arriving from Montgomery were arrested for attempting to integrate the station’s segregated waiting area and lunchroom. Continuing Freedom Rides ended in November 1961 when the Kennedy administration urged the ICC to enforce its ban on segregated interstate transportation. Building exterior retains high integrity. Building interior has been remodeled and primary research is needed to determine high integrity.

PUBLIC ACCOMMODATIONS

Segregating Public Accommodations, 1865-1900

Properties listed in this section are associated with legal reform and important precedent setting U.S. Supreme Court rulings on the constitutionality of racial segregation in public accommodations.

Maguire’s Theater – San Francisco, California
Nichol’s Inn – Missouri
Grand Opera House – New York, New York
Inn – Kansas
Civil Rights Cases (1883)
The above properties are associated with the combined Civil Rights Cases brought forth by the federal government to test the public accommodations language of the Civil Rights Act of 1875. In its decision, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that the Fourteenth Amendment gave Congress the power to restrain states, but not individuals, from acts of racial discrimination and segregation. This decision forever hampered the Supreme Court from ruling against private discrimination under the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and solidified Southern segregation until passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. No property known to exist.

Maintaining Segregated Public Accommodations, 1900-1940

The property listed in this section is associated with protest and conflict and represents federal intervention vital to bringing the issue of Jim Crow segregation to the national foreground.

Lincoln Memorial – Washington, D.C. (NPS Unit, 1966)

Marian Anderson concert (1939)

On Easter Sunday, 1939, Marian Anderson performed in concert on the grounds of the memorial, as arranged by Eleanor Roosevelt, after the Daughters of the American Revolution denied Anderson the right to perform at their facility, Constitution Hall. The event was seen as a symbolic blow to Jim Crow segregation. (Also see Desegregating Public Accommodations, 1955-1964 below for association of site with 1963 March on Washington.)

Desegregating Public Accommodations, 1955-1964

The properties listed below are associated with events or individuals under the areas of legal reform, massive organization, or protest and conflict. Under legal reform, properties are either pivotal to interpreting the constitutionality of Title II of the Civil Rights Act or overturning discrimination in public transportation. Under massive organization, properties represent either an important new phase of the civil rights movement or a strategic step in SNCC, CORE, or SCLC campaigns crucial to the movement. Under protest and conflict, properties were pivotal to a grassroots strategy directly leading to enforcement of the Interstate Commerce Act or passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

Clark Memorial United Methodist Church

Nashville, Tennessee

Nonviolent Workshop Training (1958-1959)

Between 1958 and 1959, pastor and civil rights activist James Lawson conducted weekly nonviolence training in this church that produced future student leaders Diane Nash, James Bevel, and John Lewis who figured prominently in such events as the 1961 Freedom Rides and the 1963 Birmingham protests. These events and this training effectively led to federal government intervention needed to restore civil rights to African Americans. This property no longer retains high integrity due to a modern addition that obscures the building where the training was held.
Highlander Folk School – Monteagle, Tennessee

Civil Rights Training (1950s-1961)

Septima Poinsette Clark

Founded in 1932 and serving as a center for labor education in the South, this school became a training center for the civil rights movement in the 1950s with attendees such as Martin Luther King, Jr., Rosa Parks, and prominent student leaders. Following government investigations in the late 1950s, the school’s charter was revoked and the school closed in December 1961. The property was then auctioned off. The school is also associated with Septima Poinsette Clark, “Queen mother of the civil rights movement” and the school’s director of education. This property no longer retains high integrity due to interior and exterior alterations.

---

F. W. Woolworth – Greensboro, North Carolina

(National Register listed, Downtown Greensboro Historic District, 1982)

Sit-in Movement (1960)

This building is the site of the student-led sit-in on February 1, 1960, that began the nation’s sit-in movement to integrate lunch counters and restaurants. Introduction of youth into the movement during this event brought a new phase in the national civil rights movement. This property is being redeveloped as a museum. A portion of the lunch counter is on exhibit at the Smithsonian Museum of American History.

---

Parking Deck – Wilmington, Delaware

Burton v. Wilmington Parking Authority (1961)

In this case the U.S. Supreme Court determined that states are responsible in the area of civil rights for the conduct of businesses to which they rent land. A private restaurant in this publicly owned parking deck had refused service to a black city councilman. Together with two lower court decisions, this ruling helped to define state and private discriminatory action and legal requirements of tenants of state property. Interior conversion to a bookstore requires a more detailed assessment of high integrity. Significance of this event should also be compared with a similar 1954 U.S. Supreme Court case (Muir v. Louisville Park Theatrical Association). A National Register nomination is anticipated for this property.
Shiloh Church
Mount Zion Church – Albany, Georgia
(Mount Zion, National Register listed, 1995)
Albany Movement (November 1961 to August 1962)
Meetings to plan the first major test of nonviolent direct action against segregation by SNCC and SCLC took place in these churches. The Albany Movement proved to be a testing ground for the Birmingham movement (and SNCC’s broader attack in Mississippi’s 1964 Freedom Summer) that garnered national attention and federal government support, but failed to desegregate public facilities. Buildings are extant, integrity of Shiloh is unknown. Mount Zion is now a civil rights museum.

Sixteenth Street Baptist Church
Birmingham, Alabama
(National Register listed, 1980)
Birmingham Movement (April - May 1963)
This church served as the organizational and staging background of the Easter Sunday children’s march to integrate public accommodations that proved to be one of the most dramatic confrontations with segregation in the nonviolent movement. Mass coverage of the event garnered national empathy for the civil rights movement and led to passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. This property retains high integrity.

Gaston Motel – Birmingham, Alabama
Birmingham Movement (April - May 1963)
This motel served as the Southern Christian Leadership Conference’s (SCLC) headquarters, staging, and press conference area during the 1963 Birmingham campaign. Exterior of property and the setting retain high integrity.
Kelly Ingram Park – Birmingham, Alabama
(National Register listed under the name West Park, 1984)

_Birmingham Movement_ (April - May 1963)
This park served as the staging background of the May 1963 Easter Sunday children’s march to integrate public accommodations. The march resulted in one of the most dramatic nonviolent confrontations in segregation protest, and led to the passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.
_Transformation of this park from open space into a commemorative space makes the park ineligible for individual designation, but may retain integrity as a contributing element of a district (see below)._

Birmingham Civil Rights Historic District
_Birmingham Movement_ (April – May 1963)
In 2003, the Alabama Historical Commission (State Historic Preservation Office) completed a draft National Register of Historic Places Multiple Property Documentation Form for The Civil Rights Movement in Birmingham, Alabama, 1933-1979. This documentation recognized the potential for a Birmingham Civil Rights NHL district. Consideration should be given to a more intensive study of a potential Birmingham Civil Rights NHL district.

Lincoln Memorial – Washington, D.C.
(NPS Unit, 1966)
_March on Washington_ (1963)
The Lincoln Memorial is associated with two civil rights events that have come to symbolize the demand for equal rights. The memorial figured prominently in the 1963 March on Washington from where Martin Luther King delivered his “I Have A Dream” speech. (See Segregating Public Accommodations above for site’s association with singer Marion Anderson in 1939).
Martin Luther King, Jr. Historic District
Atlanta, Georgia (NHL, 1974)
This district honors the nation’s most prominent leader in the mid-20th century struggle for civil rights. The district includes King’s birthplace, the church he pastored, and his grave.

Martin Luther King, Jr. National Historic Site and Preservation District – Atlanta, Georgia (NHS, 1980)
The park’s focus includes King’s early life and development in the area and his roles in the founding of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC) and the civil rights movement. The site includes the Martin Luther King, Jr. Historic District (above).

Memorial Auditorium - Shaw University, Raleigh, North Carolina
Ella Baker, SNCC Founding (1960)
This auditorium is associated with Ella Baker, a leading civil rights activist whose philosophy of a broad-based leadership led to the creation of SNCC on April 15, 1960, in this auditorium at Baker’s alma mater. In the area of public accommodations, SNCC activists were crucial to sustaining the Freedom Rides and in coordinating student protests in the South. This building no longer retains high integrity.

Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals (renamed the 11th Circuit in 1981) - Atlanta, Georgia (National Register listed, 1974)
Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals (renamed the John Minor Wisdom U.S. Court of Appeals Building) - New Orleans, Louisiana (National Register listed, 1974)
Old Post Office and Courthouse – Montgomery, Alabama (National Register listed, 1988)
Judicial rulings (1950s-1960s)
Together with the Supreme Court, these courts were the judicial bulwark against racial discrimination in the South. Segregationist laws were overturned en masse in these courts in the late 1950s and early 1960s in dozens of cases including those in public accommodations. (See also the National Park Service’s National Historic Landmark Theme Study, Racial Desegregation of Public Education in the United States, 2000.) These buildings retain integrity.

Heart of Atlanta Motel - Atlanta, Georgia
Heart of Atlanta Motel v. United States (1964)
In this decision, the U.S. Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of Title II (the public accommodations clause) of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Plaintiffs claimed that in being forced to admit patrons they were denied due process in commerce under Article I of the Constitution. The Court ruled that Title II did not interfere with the commerce clause, and was therefore constitutional. This property has been demolished.

Ollie’s Barbecue - Birmingham, Alabama
Katzenbach v. McClung (1964)
Along with Heart of Atlanta, the Court ruling in this case upheld the constitutionality of Title II of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The U.S. government sued Ollie’s Barbecue for compliance under Title II, for refusing to serve African American patrons inside. This property has been demolished.
Table 1. Sites Recognized as Nationally Significant

Nationally recognized sites include the following four properties that have either been designated by the Secretary of the Interior as National Historic Landmarks (NHL) or designated by Congress as a unit of the National Park System.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Property</th>
<th>Event/Individual</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1. Dexter Avenue Baptist Church</td>
<td>Montgomery Bus Boycott</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Montgomery, Alabama (NHL, 1974)</td>
<td>Martin Luther King, Jr., preeminent leader</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>of the civil rights movement</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2. Martin Luther King, Jr. Historic District</td>
<td>Martin Luther King, Jr.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Atlanta, Georgia (NHL, 1974)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>3. Martin Luther King, Jr. National Historic Site</td>
<td>Martin Luther King, Jr.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>and Preservation District</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Atlanta, Georgia (NHS, 1980)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>4. Lincoln Memorial</td>
<td>1963 March on Washington</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Washington, D.C. (National Memorial, 1966)</td>
<td>Site of Marion Anderson performance</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Table 2. Sites Recommended for Further Study for National Historic Landmark Consideration

These are properties recommended for further study for National Historic Landmark consideration. This is not an exhaustive list of properties that may be eligible for consideration.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Property</th>
<th>Event/Individual</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1. Columbia (excursion steamer)</td>
<td>Supreme Court found against discrimination in foreign commerce. Bob-Lo Excursion Company v. Michigan, 1948</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ste. Claire (passenger steamboat)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ecorse, Michigan (NHLs, 1992)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2. Mount Zion Baptist Church</td>
<td>Baton Rouge Bus Boycott, 1953 that served as model for later boycotts.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Baton Rouge, Louisiana</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>3. F. W. Woolworth</td>
<td>February 1, 1960 student sit-in that began the nation’s sit-in movement to integrate lunch counters and restaurants.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Greensboro, North Carolina (NR listed,</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Downtown Greensboro Historic District, 1982)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>4. Parking Deck</td>
<td>Supreme Court found that states are responsible in the area of civil rights for the conduct of businesses to which they rent land. Burton v. Wilmington Parking Authority, 1961</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wilmington, Delaware</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>5. Greyhound Bus Station</td>
<td>1961 Freedom Ride that directly influenced enforcement of the Interstate Commerce Act to end de jure segregated public transportation.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Anniston, Alabama</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>6. Trailways Bus Station</td>
<td>1961 Freedom Ride</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Anniston, Alabama</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>7. Bethel Baptist Church and Parsonage</td>
<td>1961 Freedom Ride Early modern civil rights movement Reverend Fred Shuttlesworth, civil rights activist</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birmingham, Alabama</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>8. Greyhound Bus Station</td>
<td>1961 Freedom Ride</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birmingham, Alabama</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>9. First Baptist Church</td>
<td>1961 Freedom Ride Ralph Abernathy, civil rights activist</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Montgomery, Alabama</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>10. Greyhound Bus Station</td>
<td>1961 Freedom Ride</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jackson, Mississippi</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>11. Shiloh Church</td>
<td>Albany Movement, 1961-1962 that was the first SCLC campaign.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>12. Mount Zion Baptist Church</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Albany, Georgia</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>13. Sixteenth Street Baptist Church</td>
<td>1963 Birmingham protests that influenced passage of the 1964 Civil Rights Act to end de jure segregation in public accommodations.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birmingham, Alabama</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>(NR listed, 1980)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>14. Gaston Motel</td>
<td>(Same as above) May include above-related sites, Kelly Ingram Park, and others</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birmingham, Alabama</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>15. Birmingham Civil Rights Historic District</td>
<td>(Same as above) May include above-related sites, Kelly Ingram Park, and others</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>(Same as above)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>16. Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals</td>
<td>Court associated with bulwark of civil rights rulings enforcing integration in the South in the late 1950s-early 1960s.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Atlanta, Georgia</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>17. Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals</td>
<td>(Same as above)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>New Orleans, Louisiana</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>18. Old Post Office and Courthouse</td>
<td>(Same as above)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Montgomery, Alabama</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Table 3. Other Properties & Events Considered

This table lists properties that have either been demolished or lack high integrity needed for NHL designation, and also lists events with no associated property.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Property</th>
<th>Event/Individual</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1. (no property)</td>
<td>Supreme Court rules that only Congress has authority over interstate transportation. (Hall v. DeCuir, 1878)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2. Maguire’s Theater – San Francisco, California</td>
<td>Supreme Court finds that the federal government has no authority over private individuals in enforcing civil rights. (Civil Rights Cases, 1883)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>3. Nichol’s Inn – Missouri</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>5. Inn – Kansas</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>6. (no property)</td>
<td>Supreme Court upholds segregation in allowing state enforced segregation on interstate travel. (Louisville, New Orleans &amp; Texas Railway v. Mississippi, 1890)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>7. East Louisiana Railway Station – New Orleans, Louisiana</td>
<td>Supreme Court gives judicial sanction to the “separate but equal” doctrine. (Plessy v. Ferguson, 1896)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>8. Plessy House</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>9. John Marshall Harlan House (Judge)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>10. (no property)</td>
<td>Supreme Court found discrimination in first class travel to be unconstitutional. (Mitchell v. U.S., 1941)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>11. (no property)</td>
<td>Supreme Court bans segregation in interstate transportation. (Morgan v. Commonwealth of Virginia, 1946)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>18. Memorial Auditorium Shaw University Raleigh, North Carolina</td>
<td>Ella Baker, leading civil rights activist, whose philosophy of a broad-based leadership led to the creation of SNCC at this facility.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>20. Trailways Bus Station Montgomery, Alabama</td>
<td>1961 Freedom Ride</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>21. Heart of Atlanta Motel Atlanta, Georgia</td>
<td>U.S. Supreme Court ruling upholding the constitutionality of the Civil Rights Act of 1964</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>22. Ollie’s Barbecue Birmingham, Alabama</td>
<td>(Same as above)</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
AREAS FOR FURTHER RESEARCH

Mexican American Civil Rights
Additional attention should be given to locating properties associated with the Mexican American civil rights story that may be significant at the local and state levels. Many examples of places and events are described in the historic context. Grassroots and formal civil rights organizations, individuals, and direct action protests were important in desegregating public accommodations through both political and legal means. Unity Leagues and the League of United Latin American Citizens (LULAC) are examples of important organizations. A significant individual in this context is Ignacio Lutero Lopez who engineered desegregation of public accommodations in Southern California. Places associated with boycotts in Southern California such as the Azusa City public park and the San Angelo performing theater are examples of types of properties associated with direct action used to end discrimination in public facilities.
I. MAJOR BIBLIOGRAPHICAL REFERENCES

The references used in this study are divided into four categories: African American, Pre WWII; African American, Post WWII; Latino; and Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual, and Transgender.

African American, Pre WWII

Civil Rights Act of 1875, Ch. 114, 18 Stat. 335.

Civil Rights Cases, 108 U.S. 3 (1883).

African American, Post WWII

Latino

APPENDIX A. NATIONAL REGISTER OF HISTORIC PLACES CRITERIA

Public accommodation properties that are significant at the state or local level may be eligible for listing in the National Register of Historic Places under two National Register criteria: Criterion A for properties associated with history, or Criterion B for properties associated with lives of significant persons. The applicable National Register criteria and significance is discussed below.

Significance

National Register Criterion A, associated with events that have made a significant contribution to the broad patterns of our history.

A property associated with a public accommodations event between 1865-1964 may be eligible for the National Register under Criterion A if it is shown that the property played a definitive or crucial role that involved the right to equal access at the national, state, or local level. These will be associated with state or local campaigns to desegregate public accommodations, or legal challenges to segregated accommodations. Placement of the historic property within local and state historic contexts is required to determine relative significance.

Protest activity waged at the local level carried on the civil rights movement on a day-to-day basis, some of which were successful in desegregating accommodations. A number of communities are noted for locally based nonviolent protests. Examples include the sit-in by African Americans at the Alexandria, Virginia public library, and theater boycotts by Mexican Americans in Southern California. Numerous sit-in cases went to the U.S. Supreme Court, and although not ruling on the right to accommodations under the Constitution, the court often ruled against convictions of breach of peace and trespassing that allowed protests to continue.

National Register Criterion B: associated with lives of persons significant in our past.

Properties may be eligible for the National Register for their association with the lives of individuals who are significant in the history of public accommodations at the local, state, or national level. General guidance for nominating properties is given in National Register Bulletin 32: Guidelines for Evaluation and Documenting Properties Associated with Significant Persons. Numerous individuals played significant roles in the desegregation of public accommodations at the community level. Examples include journalist and community organizer Ignacio Lutero Lopez who influenced integrated facilities through the Spanish-language newspaper El Espectador in Southern California, and civil rights activist Jo Ann Robinson who played a crucial role in sustaining the Montgomery Bus Boycott.

Integrity

Properties considered for listing in the National Register must meet National Register criteria above and retain integrity. Integrity is defined as the ability of a property to convey its significance. There are seven aspects or qualities of integrity: location, design, setting, materials, workmanship, feeling, and association. All properties must retain the essential physical features that define both why a property is significant (criteria and themes) and when it was significant (periods of significance). These are the features without which a property can no longer be identified as, for instance, an early 20th century church or courthouse. For National Register listing, properties must possess several, and usually most, of these aspects.

Exceptions

Certain kinds of property are not usually considered for listing in the National Register including religious properties, moved properties, birthplaces and graves, cemeteries, reconstructed properties, commemorative properties and properties achieving significance within the past fifty years. These properties can be eligible for listing however, if they meet special requirements called National Register Criteria Considerations. The following exceptions may be anticipated in public accommodation properties:

Religious Properties. Many churches are associated with the African-American civil rights movement as places for organizing and motivation. To be eligible for consideration, churches must derive their primary national significance from their roles in the civil rights movement as meeting places.

Properties that have achieved significance within the last 50 years. The modern civil rights movement occurred within the last fifty years. Normally properties that have achieved significance within the last 50 years are not eligible for listing in the National Register. However, extraordinary events that occurred during this time period may have made some of these properties exceptionally important and therefore eligible for National Register listing.

Birthplaces or Graves. A birthplace or grave is eligible for the National Register if the person is of outstanding importance and if there is no other appropriate site or building directly associated with his or her productive life.

Cemetery. A cemetery would be eligible for National Register listing if it derives its primary significance from association with historic events. Cemeteries that were associated with challenges to segregation may qualify under this exception.

NATIONAL REGISTER PROPERTIES

The following is a list of properties listed on the National Register that are associated with discrimination in public accommodations.

Pastorium, Dexter Avenue Baptist Church – Montgomery, Alabama (NR, 1982)
Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. lived in this house between 1954-1960 while pastor of the Dexter Avenue Baptist Church (NHL) and as leader of the Montgomery Bus Boycott in 1955-56 that launched the modern civil rights movement and King’s career as its foremost advocate. The pastorium reflects the role of the black church in the struggle for civil rights for African Americans.

First African Baptist Church – Tuscaloosa, Alabama (NR, 1988)
This church served as demonstration headquarters for the Tuscaloosa Citizens for Action Committee that protested against segregated bathroom facilities in the new county courthouse, and against a ban on protest marches. The committee’s efforts prompted action on pending and subsequent court cases affecting local discrimination practices.

West Park (Kelly Ingram Park) – Birmingham, Alabama (NR, 1984)
This park served as the gathering place for major marches, demonstrations, rallies, and prayer services in the 1963 Birmingham campaign that received nationwide attention during demonstrations on May 2 and May 7 that desegregated Birmingham and led to passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

Sixteenth Street Baptist Church – Birmingham, Alabama (NR, 1980)
This church is the location of the September 16, 1963 bombing by white segregationists that killed four black girls. The event became a turning point in resolving the civil rights protests in Birmingham and called for unity through the country.

This courthouse is associated with District Judge Frank M. Johnson who, with Circuit Judge Richard Rives, made the ruling in Browder v. Gayle, (later affirmed by the U.S. Supreme Court), that ended the Montgomery bus boycott.

North Lawrence-Monroe Street Historic District – Montgomery, Alabama (NR, 1984)
Associated with the 1955 Montgomery Bus Boycott, this district played a major role in the success of the boycott when several of its businesses offered dispatch services to those who were boycotting.

Lincolnville Historic District – St. Augustine, Florida (NR, 1991)
Lincolnville is the principal black residential neighborhood in St. Augustine in which SCLC led a 1964 campaign to end segregation practices in the city to keep national attention on passage of the Civil Rights Act. Attempts to integrate the restaurant at Ponce de Leon Motel drew national attention following the arrest of one of the demonstrators, the 72-year old mother of the governor of Massachusetts.

Mount Zion Baptist Church – Albany, Georgia (NR, 1995)
This church is important for its role as a black gathering place in the 1961-62 Albany Movement that attracted national media and executive attention, but remained a segregated city. The movement, however, was important in directing SNCC into wider direct action campaigns. The singing of black spirituals in this church came to symbolize black resistance.

Atlanta University Center District – Atlanta, Georgia (NR, 1976)
This district’s significance includes its status as a major institution of higher learning for African Americans whose alumni include Martin Luther King, Jr. The district includes West Hunter Street Baptist Church that was pastored by Reverend Ralph David Abernathy who followed King as head of SCLC.

Downtown Greensboro Historic District – Greensboro, North Carolina (NR, 1984)
This district contains the Woolworth building which was the site of the student-led sit-in on February 1, 1960, that began the nation’s sit-in movement to integrate lunch counters and restaurants. Introduction of youth into the movement brought a new phase in the civil rights movement.
Agricultural and Technical College of North Carolina Historic District – Greensboro, North Carolina (NR, 1988)
This campus gained widespread recognition in 1960 when four of its students started the lunch counter sit-in at Woolworth’s in Greensboro that led to the sit-in movement across the south.

All Star Bowling Lane – Orangeburg, South Carolina (NR, 1996)
This property is significant for its role in the confrontation at South Carolina State College during February 1968, known as the “Orangeburg Massacre” in which three students died following protests by African American students against not being allowed in the bowling lane despite passage of the 1964 Civil Rights Act. This property was nominated to the National Register as part of the Multiple Property Nomination: “Resources Associated with the Civil Rights Movement in Orangeburg County, South Carolina.”

South Carolina State College Historic District
Orangeburg, South Carolina (NR, 1996)
This college played a major role in South Carolina civil rights activity including the 1960 sit-in movement, the Orangeburg Movement of 1963-64 aimed at desegregating public accommodations, and the Orangeburg Massacre of 1968 in which three students died. Events here were indicative of the late 1960s and early 1970s confrontations at state colleges regarding shortcomings of the civil rights movement. Subsequent legal action desegregated the All Star Bowling Lane and the regional hospital. The district was nominated to the National Register as part of the Multiple Property Nomination: “Resources Associated with the Civil Rights Movement in Orangeburg County, South Carolina.”
APPENDIX B. CHRONOLOGICAL LIST OF SELECTED LOCAL/NATIONAL MOVEMENTS

The following is a description of local and national movements noted in sources used during the course of this survey.

Early Church-Led Movements

Baton Rouge, Louisiana (June 1953)
A bus boycott in this city served as a model for later bus boycotts in Montgomery, Alabama and Tallahassee, Florida. Reverend Theodore J. Jemison, pastor of the Mt. Zion Baptist Church, led the boycott from June 18 – 25, 1953, to gain seating for blacks on a first come, first serve basis. Under this system, black passengers would fill the bus from the back and whites from the front, with no specific seats reserved for whites. The boycott group became known as the Baton Rouge Christian Movement and became an affiliate of SCLC.

Montgomery Bus Boycott (December 1955) & the Montgomery Improvement Association
This year-long bus boycott became the first major nonviolent social action of the modern civil rights era after Rosa Parks was arrested for refusing to give up her bus seat to a white passenger. Conducting the boycott was the Montgomery Improvement Association (MIA) led by Martin Luther King, Jr., pastor of the Dexter Avenue Baptist Church. The MIA became an affiliate of SCLC which formed in 1957. The Supreme Court’s decision in Gayle v. Browder (1956) that arose from this boycott ended segregation on the city’s buses.

Tallahassee, Florida (May 1956)
In May 1956, Florida A&M Students sat in the white section of a bus and were arrested for inciting to riot. Leading the subsequent bus boycott was the Inter-Civic Council (ICC) led by Reverend C. K. Steele, pastor of the Bethel Baptist Church. ICC became an affiliate of SCLC in 1957.

Birmingham, Alabama (June 1956)
A movement led by local African American organizations, most prominently by the Alabama Christian Movement for Human Rights (ACMHR) that later led to the movement’s most dramatic confrontation with segregation. The ACMHR became an affiliate of SCLC in 1957. Between 1956 and 1958, ACMHR fought for equal employment and integration of the city’s buses, public schools, and rail station.

Student-Led Movements

Greensboro, North Carolina (February 1960)
Even though other sit-ins had occurred in various cities from between 1957 and 1960, it was the student sit-in at the Woolworth’s lunch counter that launched the student sit-in movement across the South. Afterwards, eight southern states and thirty-one cities experienced sit-in demonstrations. In April 1960, leaders of the sit-in demonstrations met in Raleigh, North Carolina and formed what would become the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC).

The movement in this city resulted in desegregating some downtown theaters and lunch counters in May 1960 and produced student leaders of the Southern movement—Marion Barry, James Bevel, Diane Nash, John Lewis, and Bernard Lafayette who were trained by Reverend James Lawson, a student and teacher of Ghandian nonviolence. The first sit-in was conducted in November 1959 and became a movement after the February 1960 Greensboro sit-ins. Later sit-ins in Nashville at Kress, Woolworth, McLellan, W. T. Grant and Walgreens resulted in violence and arrests. Reverend Kelly Smith led this group from the First Baptist Church (demolished) and the group later became an affiliate of the SCLC. A bombing of the students’ attorney’s home prompted a ten-mile mass biracial march to city hall leading to negotiations for desegregation.

Durham, North Carolina (August 1957 – 1963)
Student sit-ins occurred in 1957 at the Royal Ice Cream Store and again after the 1960 Greensboro sit-in. By 1962 only limited integration of public accommodations had occurred and continuing demonstrations failed to desegregate public accommodations until passage of the 1964 Civil Rights Act. Durham was also the center of CORE’s “Freedom Highways” campaign in the state.

High Point, North Carolina (1960)
Following the Greensboro sit-in, twenty-six black high school students conducted a sit-in at the Woolworth’s lunch counter (after listening to guest preacher, Reverend Fred Shuttlesworth). The movement at High Point was ultimately successful with desegregating lunch counters in mid-1960.

Winston-Salem, North Carolina (1960)
In the first week of the Greensboro sit-in, students began a sit-in at the S. H. Kress Company lunch counter, followed by sit-ins at other lunch counters in the city. Lunch counters closed in April, but reopened on an integrated basis in May.

Tidewater, Virginia (February 1960)
NAACP youth branches led the student sit-in movement in Tidewater. Students demonstrated at the F. W. Woolworth store (Tidewater and Norfolk), Hampton drugstore, Rose’s lunch counter (Portsmith), and Bradshaw-Diehl’s Department Store. Following court orders and voluntary action, lunch counters were desegregated.

Baton Rouge, Louisiana (1960-1962)
A 1960 lunch counter sit-in at Kress department store and Sitman’s drugstore resulted in the U.S. Supreme Court case Garner v. Louisiana (1961) that found Louisiana’s law against disturbing the peace did not apply to the students’ peaceful demonstration.

Tallahassee, Florida (1960-1963)
In February 1960, local CORE members and other students staged sit-ins at places such as the Greyhound bus terminal and Woolworth’s lunch counter. Arrested for disturbing the peace and unlawful assembly after a second sit-in at Woolworth’s, students chose jail, rather than pay bail, in what reportedly became the first “jail, no bail” strategy (later used by SNCC/CORE in Rock Hill, NC in 1961). Mass arrests followed sit-ins in March 1960 and thereafter, momentum in the movement was lost due to internal divisions. Arrests in 1963 of demonstrators outside the Leon County Jail resulted in a related U.S. Supreme Court case (Adderly v. Florida, 1965) that retained the power of states to preserve their property for its lawfully intended use.
Jackson, Mississippi (March 1961, May - June 1963)
This movement became active in March 1961 when Tougaloo College students conducted a sit-in at the city’s public library. Later sit-ins by NAACP Jackson youth branches occurred at public parks, swimming pools and zoo. In May 1963, violent demonstrations and the assassination of Medgar Evers on June 12th temporarily revived the movement. Demonstrations ended when conservative black leaders (with support from the national NAACP office) and the Kennedy administration gained some concessions that ultimately left segregation intact. The city was also the culmination of the May 1961 Freedom Rides.

Cambridge, Maryland (1963)
A violent local movement began in March 1963 when the Cambridge Nonviolent Action Committee (CNAC) insisted that the city desegregate. Students from other cities joined in demonstrations. Arrests and violence (including shooting and destruction of white-owned shop windows) resulted in declaration of martial law. Intervention by Attorney General Robert Kennedy in July gained concessions to desegregate public accommodations and other facilities that were achieved only with passage of the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

National Organization Movements

Albany, Georgia Movement (November 1961 – August 1962)
Albany was the site of the first major test of nonviolent direct action that brought together the local Ministerial Alliance, the NAACP, SNCC, and SCLC. Action began when SNCC tested compliance with ICC orders to desegregate travel at the Trailways Bus Station. Unlike some other disturbances in the South, the Albany movement remained nonviolent in the face of massive arrests and national media attention. While not gaining concessions, Albany proved to be a testing ground for SCLC in Birmingham in 1963 and for SNCC’s Mississippi Freedom Summer (voting rights) in 1964.

Birmingham, Alabama (1961-1963)
SCLC joined ACMHR in violent and nationally televised confrontations with police that led to passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The movement is also associated with ACMHR’s support of the 1961 Freedom Ride.
APPENDIX C.
CHRONOLOGY OF THE MAY 1961 FREEDOM RIDE: ALABAMA & MISSISSIPPI

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>PROPERTY</th>
<th>EVENT (sources on next page)</th>
<th>INTEGRITY</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Anniston – Sunday, May 14</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Greyhound Bus Station</td>
<td>The first bus to arrive in Anniston was attacked at the terminal, tires slashed. (2 FBI agents on bus, Halberstam, 258). Bus continued for 5 or 6 miles, broke down and was firebombed. Riders rescued by Shuttlesworth’s ACMHR, driven to Bethel Baptist and Parsonage (designated Alabama contact point for riders). (Simeon Booker, black reporter for Ebony on ride, Halberstam, 259).</td>
<td>Setting and building may have high integrity. Building matches portion of building visible in press photo of event, canopy missing over loading area. Bus station is a noncontributing resource of a National Register district.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Trailways Bus Station</td>
<td>Second bus arriving in Anniston was boarded by hoodlums who attacked riders and remained on the bus into Birmingham.</td>
<td>Setting and building may have high integrity according to 1960s-70s photo showing this remodeled turn-of-century building.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Birmingham – May 14-20</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Trailways Bus Station</td>
<td>May 14 (mother’s day) Mob attacked riders and waiting newsmen.</td>
<td>Station demolished.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bethel Baptist Church &amp; Parsonage</td>
<td>Church/parsonage (Shuttlesworth/ACMHR HQ) harbored riders and found sleeping places. Coordinated with Attorney General Robert Kennedy to get riders out of Birmingham.</td>
<td>Church/parsonage/setting have high integrity.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Greyhound Bus Station</td>
<td>May 15, Attorney General on phone to Alabama authorities. Riders go to depot to continue ride to Montgomery. No driver available, CORE group decided to end Freedom Ride and flew on to New Orleans. Nashville SNCC resumed Freedom Ride, Diane Nash coordinated with Attorney General Kennedy, Department of Justice, and Shuttlesworth.</td>
<td>Building still serves as bus station and appears to have high integrity, with addition to one side and intact waiting room matching description by John Lewis in Walking with the Wind.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>May 17, Bull Connor boards bus as it approaches Birmingham, 2 riders arrested. Upon arrival, police newspaper bus windows (Halberstam, 202-3). After 2-3 hours, riders are arrested, taken into waiting area, used restrooms and were jailed.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>May 19, Bull Connor drove riders to Tennessee border. Dispatched SNCC driver returned riders to Shuttlesworth’s house and joined 2nd SNCC group that had arrived by train. Proceed to spend night at station arranging for bus to Montgomery (Halberstam, 297).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>May 20, city police and Alabama Highway patrol (16 in front, 16 behind and helicopter – Halberstam, 305) escort bus to Montgomery city limits.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Montgomery – May 20-24

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Location</th>
<th>Event Description</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Greyhound Bus Station</td>
<td>May 20, Riders, newspeople, and federal agent (Siegenthaler) were attacked in street (“attackers came out from everywhere, some riders fled over low wall with 8’ drop to concrete ramp below to federal courthouse building” – Lewis, 155). Freedom Riders spent first night in hospital, and 2nd day at home of Richard (or Dean) Harris (black pharmacist &amp; Montgomery Improvement Association supporter - Halberstam, 325). Riders met at Rev. Seay’s house and stayed at various homes. May 20, 21 federal marshals sent to Montgomery, Maxwell AFB.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>First Baptist Church</td>
<td>May 21, mass meeting with Martin Luther King, Jr., Abernathy, and Shuttlesworth, held hostage by mob outside building, in cemetery and park across the street. Federal marshals fire tear gas. King/Kennedy/Gov. Patterson conferred on phone. Martial law declared, 1,500 churchgoers released at 4:00/4:30 a.m. under armed guard.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>May 24, More than 100 National Guardsmen were stationed at Greyhound terminal. King, Abernathy, others go to waiting room and snack area. Escort includes highway patrol cars, FBI spotter cars, helicopter escort, and U.S. Border Patrol planes. Four hours later, 14 riders unexpectedly leave on 2nd bus without escort (Branch, 470-73 indicates that first bus left the Trailways, 471, and a second bus left the Greyhound, 472; Raines, 123 where Farmer reports two buses leaving the Greyhound station)</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Jackson – May 24

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Location</th>
<th>Event Description</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Greyhound Bus Station</td>
<td>Troops were stationed inside and outside terminal. Riders were arrested in white waiting room, snack area, white restroom and white cafeteria.(Halberstam, 339; Barnes, 165; Lewis, 167; and Raines, 125).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Trailways Bus Station</td>
<td>According to photodocumentation (Library of Congress, LC-USZ62-119919) second bus arrived at this station where riders were quickly arrested. James Lawson was arrested in whites-only restroom (Branch, 474). Two Trailways buses reported (New York Times and Pittsburgh Press)</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Station may lack high integrity. Bay area where buses arrived has been enclosed for restrooms, former canopy area also enclosed. Low wall that riders fled over has been relocated. Building is federally owned and leased to state. State plans underway for museum at this station.

Church has high integrity/setting may lack high integrity. Setting compromised by construction across street in former park, and to lesser extent, a change in residential character.

(see above)

Station lacks high integrity, remodeled for offices.

Station demolished.

Sources:
- Howell Raines, My Soul is Rested
  - Pittsburgh Press, May 25, 1961
APPENDIX D
CIVIL RIGHTS ACTS, INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION RULINGS, AND U.S. SUPREME COURT RULINGS
1873-1940

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Act/Case</th>
<th>Description</th>
<th>Case Facts/Property</th>
<th>State</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1873</td>
<td>Washington, Alexandria &amp; Georgetown RR v. Brown 84 U.S. 445</td>
<td>First Supreme Court ruling against segregation in a railroad case (anomaly).</td>
<td>In 1868, a black passenger was forced to leave the car reserved for whites to an equal car reserved for blacks.</td>
<td>D.C.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1875</td>
<td>Civil Rights Act of 1875 18 Stat. 335</td>
<td>Act securing same rights and privileges of social contact for blacks that whites enjoyed. Essentially covered discrimination in public transportation, public accommodations, restaurants and other places of dining.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Ryan: Maguire’s Theater, San Francisco on Bush Street between Montgomery and Kearney.
Stanley: Inn, Kansas
Nichols: Nichols House (inn), Missouri
Singleton: Grand Opera House, New York
Robinson: Tennessee Railroad Parlor Car | CA KS MI NY TN |

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Case Name</th>
<th>Facts/Summary</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1887</td>
<td>Interstate Commerce Act 49 U.S.C. Section 1</td>
<td>Act designed to achieve consistent enforcement of certain principles embedded in common law. It prohibited discrimination between persons and created the Interstate Commerce Commission (ICC) to regulate the act.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1887</td>
<td>Councill v. Western &amp; Atlantic Railroad Company 1 ICC 339</td>
<td>ICC ruled that unequal facilities violated Section 3 of the Interstate Commerce Act. Black passenger boarding a train in Chattanooga was moved to the black (filthy) car.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1888</td>
<td>Heard v. Georgia Railroad Company 1 ICC 428</td>
<td>ICC ruled that separate and unequal accommodations violated Section 3 of the Interstate Commerce Act. Georgia Railroad Company required a first-class paying black passenger to ride in the “Jim Crow car” which was a dirty smoking car.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1890</td>
<td>Louisville, New Orleans &amp; Texas Railway v. Mississippi 133 U.S. 587</td>
<td>Court upheld pro segregation, thus ruling the opposite of Hall v. DeCuir (1878) in which the court found the regulation of interstate travel to be the sole province of Congress. Mississippi statute ordered plaintiff to provide a segregated car on all its trains traveling through Mississippi. Railroad sued to stop infringement on interstate commerce.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1896</td>
<td>Plessy v. Ferguson 163 U.S. 537</td>
<td>Court upheld right of states to impose “separate but equal” facilities on blacks. Homer Plessy, a black man, sat in the whites-only section of a passenger train, thus violating an 1890 Louisiana statute creating “separate but equal” train facilities.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1900</td>
<td>Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company v. Kentucky 179 U.S. 388</td>
<td>Separate coach law is not an infringement upon exclusive power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce. Reaffirmed Louisville ruling (above) that state segregation laws that applied only to intra state travelers did not violate the commerce clause. Kentucky statute required carriers to furnish separate coaches or cars of equal quality for white and black passengers. Railway company challenged legality of law over power of Congress in commerce.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1907</td>
<td>Edwards v. Nashville 12 ICC 247</td>
<td>ICC orders end to inequality. (case specifics unknown)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1910</td>
<td>Chappele v. Louisville &amp; N.R.R. 19 ICC 456</td>
<td>Four southern railway lines must treat private cars of traveling black minstrel show as they would private cars owned by whites. (case specifics unknown)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1910</td>
<td>Chiles v. Chesapeake &amp; Ohio Railway 218 U.S. 71</td>
<td>If Congress failed to enact laws regarding segregation in interstate travel, the railway lines themselves had the right to make those rules, thereby upholding Jim Crow rule in interstate travel. (in effect, overruled 31 years later in Mitchell) Black passenger with a first class train ticket from Washington, D.C. to Lexington, Kentucky was ordered from the first class whites only section to the black section.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1913</td>
<td>Butts v. Merchants &amp; Miners Transportation Company 230 U.S. 126</td>
<td>Suit without merit because Civil Rights Cases rendered 1875 Civil Rights Act moot. There was no federal protection against racial discrimination in public accommodations. Black passenger who had purchased a first class ticket on a ship, was asked to move to the segregated black section and forced to eat after the white passengers finished. Sued under public accommodations section of 1875 Civil Rights Act.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1914</td>
<td>McCabe v. Atchison, Topeka &amp; Santa Fe Railway 235 U.S. 151</td>
<td>Case dismissed because of procedural defects. However, justices emphasized that equal protection was a right belonging to the individual, not simply to blacks as a group. Black plaintiffs sued for relief just days before a statute went into effect for railroad.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Year</td>
<td>Case Title</td>
<td>Summary</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>------</td>
<td>----------------------------------------------------------------------------</td>
<td>--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1920</td>
<td>South Covington &amp; Cincinnati Street Railway v. Kentucky 252 U.S. 399</td>
<td>Court ruled that because the line was a separate operation in Kentucky, a streetcar company had to obey its laws.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Cincinnati, Covington &amp; Erlanger Ry v. Kentucky 252 U.S. 408</td>
<td>(companion case)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1941</td>
<td>Mitchell v. United States et al. 313 U.S. 80</td>
<td>Court upheld right of blacks to sue for discrimination in interstate travel over objections of the ICC, and found that plaintiff had been discriminated against by the Rock Island &amp; Pacific Railway. Effects limited to first class travel. Important precedent to Morgan (1946) decision. Even though U.S. was a defendant, Solicitor General filed brief in support of Mitchell’s claim and ten southern states filed an amicus brief in defense.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1946</td>
<td>Morgan v. Commonwealth of Virginia 328 U.S. 373</td>
<td>Court banned segregation in interstate transportation. Ruling found State imposed segregated seating on interstate bus travel unconstitutional. (Question closed 16 years later in Bailey, 1962). Ruling had little impact on segregated travel, as rail and bus lines established their own regulations for interstate travelers. First NAACP case on segregated carrier before the Supreme Court. Ruling ignored throughout the South until 1961 Freedom Rides.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1948</td>
<td>Bob-Lo Excursion Company v. Michigan 333 U.S. 28</td>
<td>Application of state anti-discrimination statute did not violate Congressional authority to regulate interstate or foreign commerce. (Discrimination in foreign commerce was unconstitutional.)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1950</td>
<td>Henderson v. U.S. 339 U.S. 816</td>
<td>Ruling found separate accommodations on dining cars violated Section 3 of the Interstate Commerce Act of 1887. Court cited similarity to Mitchell (1941). Although a defendant in the case, the Justice Department asked the court to end discrimination on interstate railroads. This case was the first time that the government attacked the entire Jim Crow system and went before court the same day as McLaurin and Sweatt school desegregation cases. Court did not reach constitutional issues, leaving the separate but equal rule intact.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Year</td>
<td>Case Name</td>
<td>Summary</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>------</td>
<td>-----------</td>
<td>---------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1953</td>
<td>District of Columbia v. John R. Thompson Co., Inc. 346 U.S. 100</td>
<td>Court upheld validity of an 1872 anti-discrimination statute that gave blacks equal access to certain public accommodations and was supported by Eisenhower administration’s Justice Department.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1954</td>
<td>Muir v. Louisville Park Theatrical Association 347 U.S. 971</td>
<td>Racial segregation in public facilities leased to a nonpublic agency is unconstitutional. (Case was remanded in further consideration of light of Brown.)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1955</td>
<td>Mayor and City Council of Baltimore City v. Dawson 350 U.S. 877 Holmes v. Atlanta 350 U.S. 879</td>
<td>Court requires end to racial segregation at public beaches and was first extension of logic in Brown to other facilities (affirming without comment). In these cases, Court dealt with straightforward issues of segregation in public places, i.e. whether Brown applied to a park. Henceforth, Court dealt with ways desegregation was avoided.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1955</td>
<td>NAACP et al. v. St. Louis-San Francisco Railway Company et al. 297 ICC 335 Keys v. Carolina Coach Company 64 ICC 769</td>
<td>NAACP full scale attack on Jim Crow in railroad travel challenged segregation itself, not equality of facilities, and for first time attacked Jim Crow rail terminals. First time ICC rejected separate but equal doctrine when it found segregation on trains, buses, and in station waiting rooms violated the law. Yet, segregated lunch rooms operated by a separate company were not under ICC jurisdiction. Ordered companies to comply by Jan. 10, 1956 (6 weeks). Segregation continued on buses until challenged by Freedom Rides (1961). A Justice Department brief stated that segregation in interstate transit violated the Interstate Commerce Act.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1956</td>
<td>South Carolina Electric and Gas Company v. Flemming 351 U.S. 901</td>
<td>Supreme Court confirmed a Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals decision extending the Supreme Court decision in Brown to public transportation (implied approval by refusing to hear appeal).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Year</td>
<td>Case Title</td>
<td>Citation</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>------</td>
<td>------------</td>
<td>----------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1956</td>
<td>Gayle v. Browder</td>
<td>352 U.S. 903</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1958</td>
<td>New Orleans City Park Improvement Association v. Detiege</td>
<td>358 U.S. 54</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1958</td>
<td>Evers v. Dwyer</td>
<td>358 U.S. 202</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1959</td>
<td>State Athletic Commission v. Dorsey</td>
<td>359 U.S. 533</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1961</td>
<td>Burton v. Wilmington Parking Authority</td>
<td>365 U.S. 715</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1961</td>
<td>Garner et al. v. Louisiana</td>
<td>368 U.S. 157</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1962</td>
<td>Bailey et al. v. Patterson et al.</td>
<td>369 U.S. 31</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1962</td>
<td>Turner v. City of Memphis, et al.</td>
<td>369 U.S. 350</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1962</td>
<td>Taylor v. Louisiana</td>
<td>370 U.S. 154</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Year</td>
<td>Case Name</td>
<td>Facts/Decision</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>------</td>
<td>---------------------------------</td>
<td>-------------------------------------------------------------------------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1963</td>
<td>Edwards v. South Carolina</td>
<td>Court affirmed rights of peaceful civil rights demonstrators to freedom of assembly, petition, and speech under the First and Fourteenth Amendments.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1963</td>
<td>Johnson v. Virginia</td>
<td>A state may not require racial segregation in a courtroom.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1963</td>
<td>Peterson v. City of Greenville</td>
<td>Protesters of segregated dining facilities could not be arrested for trespassing when prosecution was based on a segregationist statute. Considered the principal “sit-in case” before the Supreme Court along with Avent, Gober, and Lombard below. Five cases were remanded in 1963 and 3 cases in 1964 based on Peterson.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1963</td>
<td>Lombard et al. v. Louisiana</td>
<td>Intent of government officials to uphold segregationist practices, even in the absence of specific segregationist laws, was contrary to the Fourteenth Amendment.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1963</td>
<td>Gober v. Birmingham</td>
<td>City ordinance requiring racial segregation in public accommodations was found unconstitutional.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1963</td>
<td>Shuttlesworth v. City of Birmingham</td>
<td>Convictions of aiding and abetting violation of criminal trespass overturned based on Gober.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1963</td>
<td>Wright v. Georgia</td>
<td>One cannot be punished for failing to obey a command which violates the Constitution. The police officers’ command violated the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment since it was intended to enforce racial discrimination in the park.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1963</td>
<td>Watson et al. v. City of Memphis et al.</td>
<td>Segregation of public accommodations was illegal and desegregation must proceed with all deliberate speed.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1963</td>
<td>Randolph v. Virginia</td>
<td>Remanded to Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia for reconsideration in light of Peterson (1963)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1963</td>
<td>Henry v. Virginia</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1963</td>
<td>Thompson v. Virginia</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Year</td>
<td>Case Name</td>
<td>Decision</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>------</td>
<td>-----------------------------------</td>
<td>----------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1963</td>
<td>Wood v. Virginia 374 U.S. 100</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1963</td>
<td>Daniels v. Virginia 374 U.S. 500</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1964</td>
<td>Bouie v. City of Columbia 378 U.S. 347</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1964</td>
<td>Bell v. Maryland 378 U.S. 226</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1964</td>
<td>Robinson et al. v. Florida 378 U.S. 153</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1964</td>
<td>Barr v. City of Columbia 378 U.S. 146</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1964</td>
<td>Griffin v. Maryland 378 U.S. 130</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1964</td>
<td>Mitchell v. City of Charleston 378 U.S. 551</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1964</td>
<td>Fox v. North Carolina 378 U.S. 587</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Year</td>
<td>Case Name</td>
<td>Decision or Fact</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>------</td>
<td>-----------------------------------</td>
<td>----------------------------------------------------------------------------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1964</td>
<td>Civil Rights Act of 1964</td>
<td>Title II guaranteed equal access to public accommodations such as hotels, motels, restaurants, and places of amusement.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1964</td>
<td>Hamm v. City of Rock Hill</td>
<td>The Civil Rights Act precluded state trespass prosecutions for peaceful attempts to be served on an equal basis, even though the prosecutions were instituted prior to the act’s passage.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1964</td>
<td>Heart of Atlanta Motel v. United States</td>
<td>Court upheld constitutionality of Title II, public accommodations clause of the 1964 Civil Rights Act.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1964</td>
<td>Katzenbach v. McClung</td>
<td>Along with Heart of Atlanta, Court upheld constitutionality of Title II of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1965</td>
<td>Blow v. North Carolina</td>
<td>Convictions made prior to the passage of the Civil Rights Act were abated by passage of the act. (Follows Hamm, 1964)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1965</td>
<td>Drews v. Maryland</td>
<td>Court denied certiorari to hear a case where three whites and one black person were fined $25 to disturbing the peace.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1966</td>
<td>Evans v. Newton</td>
<td>Use of a public park is a governmental action, and therefore any segregation violated the Fourteenth Amendment.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1966</td>
<td>Brown v. Louisiana</td>
<td>Interference with the right to protest the unconstitutional segregation of a public facility is intolerable under the Constitution.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1966</td>
<td>United States v. Guest</td>
<td>Interstate travel is a right secured under the Fourteenth Amendment.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1966</td>
<td>Georgia v. Rachel</td>
<td>Remanded based on Hamm (1964) to provide respondents with opportunity to prove that their prosecutions resulted from order to leave public accommodations for racial reasons.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Year</td>
<td>Case Title</td>
<td>Description</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>------</td>
<td>------------------------------------------------</td>
<td>-----------------------------------------------------------------------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1968</td>
<td>United States v. Johnson</td>
<td>Remedy provisions of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 did not foreclose criminal action against outsiders having no relation to the proprietors or owners.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1969</td>
<td>Shuttlesworth v. Birmingham</td>
<td>Birmingham’s parade permit law is invalid, thus vindicating Martin Luther King’s 1963 Easter Sunday civil rights march.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1969</td>
<td>Daniel et al. v. Paul</td>
<td>Clarified definition of “public accommodation” to include recreational areas as a “place of entertainment” under Title II of the Civil Rights Act.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1970</td>
<td>Adickes v. S. H. Kress &amp; Co</td>
<td>Private businesses were not liable for damages from racial discrimination, even if the discriminatory action violates state policy. Since Kress was not being ordered by the state to keep its segregationist policy, plaintiff could not recover damages.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1971</td>
<td>Palmer et al. v. Thompson</td>
<td>Segregated facilities closed to all persons did not constitute a denial of equal protection.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Hoodlums assaulted blacks for exercising their right to patronize a restaurant.
Shuttlesworth convicted for violating an ordinance of Birmingham, making it an offense to participate in any “parade or procession or other public demonstration,” without first obtaining a permit.
Lake Nixon Club, an amusement and entertainment center based in Little Rock, refused to serve black customers on the basis that it was a private club.

To avoid a district court ruling that all of Jackson’s public facilities be open to all races, the city sold off ownership in four city pools and handed the lease on a fifth pool to the YMCA which continued to operate the pool for whites only.