THE STATE OF THE UNIVERSITY

In one of his first public statements as President of Indiana University, Dr. John W. Ryan described IUPUI and the I.U. regional campuses as ". . . the growing edge of the University. And we must do all possible to continue their support.

"At Indianapolis, we have just made a significant stride forward. IUPUI is already a major university, and it will benefit from the full force of the University System to maintain the momentum of growth and development. ICFAR -- bringing the engineering, health and social sciences resources of Purdue and Indiana Universities to focus on the community needs and interests of Indianapolis as well as the state -- is one remarkable illustration of the value of this collaboration, and one which will be closely watched throughout the educational world.

"We must maintain and enhance the excellence for which our university is already noted. Most of the history of Indiana University has been focused at Bloomington. . . This resource to the State must be maintained in its excellence, yet modified continually to meet the needs of the times.

"High on our agenda will be a hard look at the extensive reorganization of the University undertaken two years ago. Much progress has been made, but our present position must be evaluated in view of changing needs of the state and institution."

A transportation system that would link IUPUI campuses, using shuttle buses, is under active consideration. At the direction of Chancellor Maynard K. Hine, a feasibility study is under way. "This is a complex and important problem," Chancellor Hine said. "We are concerned with meeting potential needs, particularly among students, for movement between the various locations where classes will be scheduled."

A committee, including representatives of the IUPUI offices of Student Services and Business Manager, has been evaluating several options, taking into account such factors as operational considerations, costs, and potential usage. A survey of more than 400 students at the Downtown and 38th Street Campuses indicated interest in having such a system available. These preliminary studies have resulted in a proposal that the service be established for a two-month trial period.
