MORE ABOUT WORKMAN'S COMPENSATION

What Happens To Your Pay If You Are Missing Work Because Of An On-The-Job Injury?
Rest assured. You will be paid. How much pay you get depends on several things.
Let's look at an example.

Suppose you work weekdays, Monday through Friday. One Thursday, while replacing a light bulb, you fall from a ladder and break your arm. You receive treatment in the Student-Employee Health Service and are instructed to remain off work for three weeks.

The first seven calendar days you are off, you would receive full pay for any days that you would normally be working. That is, since you went home on Thursday you would be paid for Friday (the first day). Saturday and Sunday you would not normally be working so you would not be paid. But, the following Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday are days you would be working so you would be paid for them in full.

Now, on the following Friday (the eighth day) you would begin to be paid out of Workman's Compensation funds. What can you expect to receive from these funds? The law provides the following compensation:

- (a) If you earn less than $100 per week - you would receive 60% of that amount each week (Example: you earn $80 per week...you would get $48.)
- (b) If you earn $100 or more - and have no dependents, you would receive $60.
- (c) If you earn $105 or more - and have 1 dependent, you would receive $63.
- (d) If you earn $110 or more - and have 2 dependents, you would receive $66.
- (e) If you earn $115 or more - and have 3 dependents, you would receive $69.
- (f) If you earn $120 or more - and have 4 dependents, you would receive $72.
- (g) If you earn $125 or more - and have 5 dependents, you would receive $75.

The above schedule gives you the idea of what you could expect to receive. In any event, $75 is the most you can receive regardless of how much you make each week.

There is one more thing to consider. If you have sick time coming to you, these days can be used to supplement the Workman's Compensation payment. This is done by using one-half sick day each day you are off. This makes up the difference between your compensation pay and your normal pay.

So, in our example if you had eight sick days coming, and you used one-half sick day each day you were off...then you would have enough sick days to cover you for 16 days, or the entire period of your recovery...and you would be receiving a full paycheck during the entire time.

But remember, unless the necessary paper work is on file in this Student Employee Health Service, these important benefits may be delayed during the time you need them most. Finally, if you have any questions, call the Student-Employee Health Service at 264-8214.
