WATER QUALITY CONFERENCE TO ATTRACT CONCERNED CITIZENS

Environmentalists, legislators and pollution experts will headline a two-day water quality conference this month designed especially for laymen interested in the continuing flow of pure and safe water.

Authorities on the local and Federal level will participate in the conference February 25-26 in the Krannert Building on the 38th Street Campus of IUPUI. The special program is being sponsored by the Purdue School of Science of IUPUI and the League of Women Voters.

"We are trying for a cross-section of experts to make the concerned citizen aware of what is involved in water quality, how you determine it, how you get it, how you keep it, and some of the political problems involved in the process," said Dr. Gerald W. Zimmerman, research associate in the Department of Physics at IUPUI and a planner of the conference. The other chief co-ordinator is Ms. Penny Zimmerman, a member of the environmental quality committee of the League of Women Voters. They are co-directors of the Indiana Safe Drinking Water Task Force.

Conference discussions will focus on the hazards to water created as a by-product of technology and the introduction of new chemicals into the environment, measures taken and plans related to the Water Pollution Control Act now in effect, and new upgraded standards for drinking water added to the 1974 Safe Drinking Water Act.

Among others, the participants will include Dr. Gordon Robeck, director of water supply research for the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency (EPA); Dr. Daniel Okun, Keenan Professor, Department of Environmental Engineering, University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, and Jay H. Lehr, executive director of the American Well Water Association.

The conference will open February 25 at 9:30 a.m. with remarks from Indianapolis Mayor William H. Hudnut III, followed by Lehr who will talk about the status of water quality in America and Dr. Okun who will outline approaches to water quality problems.

The afternoon discussion topics will be wildlife and recreational concerns with Dr. David G. Frey, zoology professor at I.U.-Bloomington; agricultural concerns with Dr. Harry W. Galloway, agronomy professor at Purdue; state management of water quality with John Winters from the Indiana State Board of Health, and drinking water concerns with Dr. Robeck.

Water politics, legislation and controlling agencies will form the outline of the program when it resumes February 26 at 10 a.m. Jean Packard of the National Association of Counties will talk about water quality, local government and the citizens.

J. Edward Roush, former U.S. Congressman from Indiana's 4th District, will discuss Indiana's environment and economy at 11 a.m.

Water quality issues, legislative objectives and limitations are on the afternoon agenda which starts at 1:30 p.m. The five-member panel will include Joseph Harrison, chief of the water supply branch of Region V of the EPA, who will discuss responsibilities of Federal agencies, and Oral H. Hert, director of the Bureau of Engineering of the Indiana State Board of Health, who will discuss coordination of state and Federal programs.

Also, John Janic, chief water quality planner of the Northwest Indiana Regional Planning Commission, discussing approaches to regional planning; John Craddock of the water quality division of the City of Muncie discussing how municipalities can deal with water quality issues, and Robert J. Becker, vice-president for plant operations of the Indianapolis Water Company, discussing water supply and industry.

At 3 p.m. three concurrent sessions will be held for public discussion: Environmental aspects of water quality, governmental aspects of water quality and technical aspects of water quality.

Registration for the conference may be made before the first session on Friday. Those attending will be responsible for meals and other accommodations. Parking in the IUPUI lot adjacent to the Krannert Building will be available to persons at the conference.
