Butler College, Arvington.

The purpose of this department of the University is to furnish the means of a general education in the arts and sciences. It is believed that such education not only contributes to liberal culture, but affords a preliminary training of immense practical value in professional or business life.

Butler College is well prepared to meet all demands made upon it. It has a competent faculty of instructors; it is conducted on modern methods; it is provided with thoroughly equipped laboratories, a well selected library, a commodious reading room, a gymnasium furnished with requisite apparatus. Its buildings, five in number, are modern in construction and well suited to the purposes for which they were designed. They are lighted by electricity and heated by steam, and occupy a campus ample in extent.

Thorough courses are offered in various lines of study adapted to the special needs of students preparing for professional or literary or scientific pursuits. Our affiliation to the University of Indianapolis enables us to offer superior opportunities to students preparing for professional schools.

The institution is co-educational, and the interests of women students are carefully considered. Irvington, the seat of the college, is a healthful and pleasant residence suburb of Indianapolis, connected with the city by electric street car line.

Medical Department

University of Indianapolis

Medical College of Indiana

The twenty-sixth annual session of this school closed April 1st, 1896. This was the most prosperous session the institution has ever known, both in point of attendance and thoroughness of instruction. For the first time in its history the college has a building erected especially for it, and fitted up in such a manner as to suit the requirements of advanced medical education.

The new building, occupied exclusively by the college, situated on the corner of Market street and Senate avenue North, has proven satisfactory in every respect. The facilities for instruction, which now compare favorably with most colleges, will be considerably increased with the beginning of the next session.

This institution has now become a department of the University of Indianapolis. Its name, however, will be preserved as heretofore. The alliance will insure increased stability and increased support, and will in many ways, it is confidently expected, benefit the institution, and make its diplomas more valuable and desirable.

The matriculation list of the last session showed two hundred and nine students in attendance. The Faculty numbers nineteen, with sixteen lecturers and assistants. The twenty-seventh annual session will begin September 29, 1896.

For catalogues and all particulars as to curriculum, fees and special facilities for teaching, address the Dean,

Dental Department of the University of Indianapolis

Indiana Dental College.

The Indiana Dental College will begin its eighteenth annual session October 6, 1896. The college is now occupying its own building, which was erected for dental educational purposes. The building is on the southwest corner of Ohio and Delaware streets; centrally located and easily accessible from all parts of the city.

During the session of 1895-1896 there were 157 students in attendance at the Indiana Dental College. Of these 43 were Seniors, 47 were Juniors and 67 were Freshmen. The growth of the college has been steady and sure, indicating its worth as an educational institute. Our students come from all parts of the United States.

The fame of our city as an educational center is rapidly spreading. Indianapolis is now closer to the center of population of the United States than any other city. Its railroad facilities, healthfulness, and other advantages combine to render it an ideal college town.

Indiana Law School.

University of Indianapolis.

The Indiana Law School was organized for the purpose of giving to the law students of the middle-West an opportunity to acquire a more thorough and systematic knowledge of the law than has heretofore been afforded them by any institution within easy reach of their homes. The success attending the past two years has been highly encouraging.

The school now forms a part of the University of Indianapolis, and degrees and diplomas are conferred by authority of the Senate and Trustees of the University.

The need of comprehensive legal training is greater now than ever before. The day is past when a student could obtain adequate legal instruction in the office of an attorney in active practice. With the rapid growth of the country and the consequent complication of business affairs, the demand for thoroughly equipped law schools has greatly increased.

Only the most rigid instruction can now properly educate the student in this most complex of all the sciences, and the lawyer in active practice is ordinarily too much engrossed with his professional duties to give the student in his office the personal attention needed to train him for the bar. The late Chief Justice Waite expressed the opinion of all the most eminent jurists when he said that law schools are now a necessity. The attorney of high standing and large practice can not give up time for the advice and daily drill that must form a great part of the legal education of to-day. Even though he may endeavor to give the attention needed he will be subject to the numerous demands and interruptions of his clients, who have the first right to his time and attention. The student in an office is thus thrown in great measure upon his own resources, and is obliged to pick his way well-nigh unaided through the most intricate branches of the law.

More than this, he must pursue his studies subject to the many hindrances and annoyances imposed upon him by the duties he owes to the lawyer in whose office he is.

It must be conceded that such office training is of great value in a practical way, but it is urged that it alone can not to-day yield satisfactory results. He who is well versed in the science of the law will readily take up the routine of office work, but he who only knows the formal workings of a law office can seldom make a good lawyer.

The biography of Governor Oliver P. Morton, now in press, gives an interesting story concerning his career as a lawyer. Years after he had been admitted to the bar, and a short time after serving as judge of the circuit court, he recognized his lack of adequate professional training, and before again entering the practice became a student at the Cincinnati Law School, where he remained one year.

The object of all college and university training should be to turn out a body of good learners, men who know how to study and who have learned how to use what they know. There can be no substitute for the daily contact of mind with mind—the mingling of numbers of alert and ambitious young men engaged in the pursuit of a common object.

A successful law school will give to its students a comprehensive and thorough knowledge of legal principles coupled with a thorough acquaintance with the details of professional work. To accomplish this it is necessary that the school shall have a force of instructors who are lawyers of wide professional experience and of special aptitude for the work of instruction. They must be men who can present the various branches of the law not only fully and clearly, but in an interesting manner as well, for subjects so presented will be best remembered. The notion growing in some quarters that the mere student of law who knows nothing of its practice is the best instructor is a mistaken notion; as well may it be said that chemistry can best be taught by a professor who has never been in a laboratory.

Experience has shown it to be not enough, however, that a law school should be equipped with an able corps of lecturers and instructors, conducting their scheme of education in accordance with a well-considered course of study and method of instruction. To secure the best results, the school should be located in a city where the student may breathe the atmosphere of courts and watch the administration of the law in tribunals of all grades from the highest to the lowest. This must be in addition to the moot court work which should always be part of a law school course. The association with courts and with lawyers is of the greatest aid to students, and the advantages of such association can hardly be overestimated. In a word, the work of the advocate can only be thoroughly taught in a law school where the student is enabled to supplement his class-room and moot court work by the object lessons of the actual court room.

The Indiana Law School offers all of these advantages. The faculty and lecturers are of the first rank; some are in active practice, others are upon the bench, several are authors of widely known legal text-books. The course of study is thorough and complete, and joins theory and practice in such a way as to free the graduate from many embarrassments under which the young practitioner usually labors in making practical application of legal principles during his early work at the bar. The method of instruction has received the most particular consideration by the faculty, and that system of teaching will be used in each branch of study which will insure the best results.

ADVANTAGES OF LOCATION.

As the location for a law school the city of Indianapolis has no superior in the country. Nowhere has the student better opportunities to watch the progress of all sorts of litigation in courts of all grades. All of the courts of the state of Indiana from the Supreme Court down to that of lowest jurisdiction, and also the United States Circuit and District Courts, are in almost continuous session here during the school year. The value to the student of the knowledge of court procedure to be thus secured can hardly be placed too high. He not only learns routine court work, but he learns, also, the manner of cross-examination of witnesses: he sees the practical application of the rules governing the admission of evidence and the methods of its introduction; not only this, but the student is thus afforded opportunities to observe and study the trial methods and styles of argument of prominent lawyers from all parts of the country as they are brought here by litigation in which they are interested.

During the past year the classes have attended the open sessions of the Supreme Court where they have been greatly interested and instructed by the oral argument of some of the ablest lawyers of the country.

Indianapolis presents the advantages of city life without the drawbacks of a city of the largest size. The cost of living here is low, although it is the seat of great professional and commercial activity. The litigation arising in the different courts is of the most varied character, and involves the most diverse business interests, and the student may thus acquaint himself with business methods as well as court procedure.

REQUIREMENTS FOR ADMISSION.

No examination will be required for admission to the Junior class, but the student must have received such general education as will enable him to pursue with profit the course of study prescribed for the Junior year.

Candidates will be admitted to the Senior class upon satisfactory examination in the subjects covered by the course of study in the Junior year.

Students who have successfully completed the Junior year at other law schools, approved by the faculty, will be admitted to the Senior class without examination.

The examination for admission to the Senior class will be held on the first two days of the school year.

REGISTRATION AND ASSIGNMENT OF SEATS.

Candidates for admission must register their names and pay the first half of their tuition fee at the office of the Dean in the school building, during the first week of the year. The second half of the tuition fee must be paid during the week following the resumption of work after the holiday recess.

Students may select their seats in the lecture-room in the order in which they pay their tuition fees. Each student will be expected to retain for the entire school year the seat chosen.

DEGREES AND CERTIFICATES.

The degree of Bachelor of Laws will be conferred by the University of Indianapolis upon those students who pass the Senior examinations at the close of the course, and have been recommended for the degree by the Faculty of the school. When a student shall have successfully completed such a portion of the course as does not entitle him to graduate, he may, upon application to the Dean, receive a certificate setting forth that fact.

COURSE AND METHOD OF INSTRUCTION.

It is the intention of the faculty to afford the students such a legal education as will be fully equal to that attainable elsewhere, the purpose being to prepare students for practice in any state. The course of instruction unites the advantages of all approved methods, and the student will not only be taught legal principles, but also how to apply them to cases as they arise. With this end in view, theory and practice will be combined. With the multiplication of statutes and reported cases in the several states it is becoming more important every year that young men, embarking in the practice, should be thoroughly conversant with the jurisprudence of their own state. The reported decisions of the supreme and appellate courts of Indiana alone are contained in one hundred and sixty volumes; and new statutes modifying existing laws are enacted at every session of the General Assembly. And while it is the purpose of the plan of instruction pursued to thoroughly ground the student in the elementary rules of law applicable to all the states—the student who expects to pursue the practice in Indiana will find in this school exceptional advantages and opportunities which cannot be had elsewhere. The course of study covers a period of two years of eight months each. There are two terms in each year, the first ending at the beginning of the holiday vacation, and the other covering the remainder of the year.

Every student is expected to attend every lecture delivered before the class of which he is a member, and to attend every daily recitation of his class, and be prepared to take a part therein; also to keep note books of lectures. No notes will be considered satisfactory unless taken by the student himself in the lecture-room. Note books must be handed in for examination when called for.

Students will be informed by the faculty what text-books will be essential, and they are advised to delay purchasing until they enter the law school. Arrangements will be effected by which purchases can be made at Indianapolis at reasonable prices.

MOOT COURTS.

Moot courts constitute an important feature of the course, and will be held every week of the school year, the Senior Moot Court under the especial charge of Mr. Harris, and the Junior Moot Court under the especial charge of Mr. Kappes. Suits will be formally commenced and conducted to issue, trial, judgment, appeal, etc., thus giving the student an opportunity to qualify himself for the practical application of the lessons received in the lecture room. These moot courts will familiarize the student with the lesser details of routine court work as well as with the more general matters of pleading and practice.

The incorporation of Butler College, The Indiana Medical College, The Indiana Dental College and The Indiana Law School into the University of Indianapolis has already brought about a comradeship among the students which adds zest and interest to school life. The 22d of February has been set apart as a permanent students' day, on which all the colleges unite in a union patriotic parade and celebration, followed by an oration appropriate to the occasion.

ADMISSION TO THE BAR.

The diploma of the Law School of the University of Indianapolis will admit the graduate to the bar of the Supreme Court of Indiana, and also to that of the United States Courts, without examination.

LOCATION OF SCHOOL.

The school is located at No. 71 West Market street, in the business center of the city and in the district in which the lawyers' offices lie. The Supreme Court of Indiana and the Appellate Court of Indiana are in continuous session during the school year in the State Capitol, one half block distant. The Circuit and District Courts of the United States are held in the Federal Building, which is two and one-half blocks distant from the school. The Marion Circuit Court, the three divisions of the Marion Superior Court, and the Marion Criminal Court, hold their sessions in the county court-house, three and one-half blocks from the school.

The building in which the school is located has been fitted up with a view to its occupancy by the school. The first floor consists of a moot court room, a library and study room, and the offices of the Dean and the Secretary. On the floor above are two large lecture rooms and two faculty rooms. The building is amply lighted by natural light during the day and is fitted with electric lights for night use.

LIBRARIES.

The law library of the Supreme Court of Indiana, which has a wide reputation for its completeness, is located in the State Capitol, as is also the Indiana State (miscellaneous) Library. The Indianapolis Public Library is but two blocks from the school. All of these libraries are open without charge.

By the courtesy of the Marion County Bar Association, students of the school are allowed the free use of its large and very complete law library in the county court-house.

The new building of the Indianapolis Public Library contains reading rooms open to the public on every day and evening of the week. All periodicals and books of reference may be found there. The State Library also has a reading-room in connection with it.

PRIZES.

The publishers of the American and English Encyclopedia of Law offer a complete set of the new edition of that work as a prize to the best student of the graduating class. The award will be made to one of the ten who stand highest in examination—the selection to be made by a vote by ballot of the entire Senior class.

Free tuition for the Senior year will be given to the best student of the Junior class—the selection to be made by the Juniors from the five who stand highest in examination.

GYMNASIUM.

The gymnasium of the Y. M. C. A. is in the Y. M. C. A. building, one block from the school. All the privileges of the Association, including the use of the gymnasium, reading-room and bath-rooms, may be had for the sum of three dollars for six months.

SESSIONS AND VACATIONS.

The course of study for each year will extend from the first Tuesday in October to the last Wednesday in May. There will be a holiday vacation including Christmas and New Years, and such further recesses as are indicated by the calendar on the sixth page of this circular.

FEES AND EXPENSES.

The tuition fee is $80.00, one-half of which is payable on the opening of the school year, the remainder when work is resumed after the midwinter recess. The fee for graduation is $5.00.

Students may re-attend without charge any course for which they have paid once.

Students can obtain board and lodging at prices varying from $3.50 to $8.00 per week, including fuel and light. Where two students room together the cost may be lessened.

Many students can find desk room in the offices of attorneys of the city free of charge.
